It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

ENTERED, according to an Act of Congress, in the year 1839, by
C. S. STEWART,
In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of Massachusetts.

MARDEN & KIMBALL, PRINTERS,
No. 3 School Street.

TO THE
HONORABLE SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, OF NEW-JERSEY,
SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, ETC. ETC.

DEAR SIR :

You are one of the few friends for whose perusal the manuscript, now committed to the press, was originally written; and I avail myself, with great pleasure, of its publication, to acknowledge the kindness of your friendship at a period of life when the guardianship of the wise is most essential. To the affectionate and parental counsels received from you, in early youth, I attribute benefits which must ever make your name dear to the best feelings of

Your attached friend,

aration for the arrival and favorable reception of the missionaries, which nothing short of His overruling wisdom and omnipotent power could have achieved ; and, from first to last, the manifestations of His spiritual presence and direct aid in the accomplishment of their objects, have been multiplied and unfailing. Still, from the earliest establishment of the missionaries there to the present period, books of travel and voyages have not been wanting in which their success has been denied, and every good result of their labors more than questioned ; while, at the same time, a part of the periodical and newspaper press, in various quarters of the world, has been unsparing and unwearied in its defamation of their motives, qualifications, influence, integrity, and entire reputation.

It is in view of these facts, that the present reprint has been deemed especially desirable and important. As a daily and private record—for the period of near three years—of the early history of the mission, it necessarily unfolds, in its details, the motives, objects, and whole policy of the missionaries, and exhibits without disguise the nature of their influence, the character of their instructions and the amount, at the time, of their success ; while, in connection with the Introduction to the London edition, by the Rev. Mr. Ellis, and the Letters subjoined as an Appendix, it will also present, in a degree at least, the cause and true source of the opposition and detraction which have, at all periods, been so determinately and unremittedly manifested.

This volume, thus enlarged, is designed to be the first of a uniform series, of which a reprint of the “Visit to the South Seas,” with similar additions, will constitute the second and third, and a new work the fourth—the whole to furnish an exposition of the origin, progress, present state and prospects of the mission, as an enterprise of philanthropy and piety, and of the islands as a nation, in the faithfulness and accuracy of which the public may confidently rely.

In leaving the United States for the Sandwich Islands, I bade farewell, as I thought, to my country forever; and felt it a duty to transmit to those most deeply interested in my destiny, a minute account of the scenes and events of a voluntary exile. With this view, the following journal was addressed to the lady of J. M. Bowers, Esq., of Bowerstown, Otsego county, New-York, in the expectation of its being read by other family connexions and personal friends.

In the number of the last was the Rev. Dr. Green, during whose presidency of the College of New-Jersey, I was a student at Nassau Hall; and to whose ministry of the Gospel, in the grace of God, is to be traced the origin of the principles and affections which resulted in my becoming a missionary to the heathen. By this gentleman, extracts from the manuscript were introduced into the pages of the Christian Advocate, of Philadelphia; others appeared in the Herald of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, at Boston; and both gave rise to various and repeated applications, on my arrival in America, for the publication of the whole in a connected form.

It was believed that a record of facts and circumstances, made, at the time of their occurrence, for the gratification of private friends only, and necessarily unfolding the motives, feelings, pursuits, and success of those engaged in the missionary enterprise, would have a salutary influence. To prepare a document of the kind for the public eye, so as to guard, on the one hand, against an obtrusion of points too private and personal for general perusal, and, on the other, against an obliteration so fastidious as to take from the work its original and appropriate character, was a delicate task. But the prospect of an advantage, however slight, to a cause to which I have devoted my life, has been sufficient to lead to the experiment.

The original manuscript was written under every disadvantage of place and circumstances, and its highest pretension was that of a true delineation of scenes and characters, as they passed before me. In assuming a printed form, it can prefer no other claim. The only alteration I have made, in a hasty and interrupted revisal of the original, is that of collecting, in some cases, under a single date, remarks and facts upon the same topic found under several; and, in one or two instances only, that of adding, from other memoranda, matter never transmitted to America, the introduction of which became necessary for the elucidation of subjects which, otherwise, could be but imperfectly understood.

Trusting to the kindness of my readers, on the point which has given me most anxiety—the extent of erasure desirable—without other apology than the explanations given, I cheerfully place the volume in their hands.

INTRODUCTION.

BY THE REV. MR. ELLIS, OF LONDON.

FROM THE FIRST ENGLISH EDITION.

IN the course of the last eight or nine years, public attention, in Europe and America, has been frequently directed to the SANDWICH ISLANDS. The demolition of the ancient temples, the destruction of the idols, the renunciation of the national religion in 1819, and the establishment of a Christian mission among them early in the following year, were events remarkable and important in the estimation of all who take an interest in the propagation of Christianity throughout the world. The discovery of vast numbers of sperm whales, first in the northern Pacific and afterwards on the coast of Japan, has occasioned an increase of the shipping accustomed to resort for repairs and refreshments to the Sandwich Islands, to so great a degree that, instead of a few uncertain calls, not less than one hundred vessels touch at the islands in the course of a year. The visits they have received from Capts. De Freycinet, Vassellieu and Kotzebue, in the French and Russian ships of discovery which have recently traversed the Pacific, together with the more subsequent ones of Lord Byron and Capt. Jones in British and American vessels of war — the peculiar facilities afforded by their local situation to the important and growing commerce which the establishment of the South American states has now opened between the western shores of the new continent and the eastern parts of India and China — have naturally attracted the attention of Europe and America, and probably rendered a settlement among these interesting islands an object of desire with more than one maritime power of the present day.

In addition to these circumstances, a project so bold and patriotic as that of the rulers of a people, with whom we had been accustomed only to associate ideas of all that was degrading in ignorance and ferocious in savage life, traversing a distance greater than half the circumference of our globe in order to visit and behold for themselves a country whose fame had long reached their distant and isolated shores—with the sincere desire to improve the condition of a nation which Providence had committed to their government and care—justly attracted no ordinary attention. The dignified propriety of their manners, and the mild benevolence of their dispositions, were not less agreeable than their complexion, language, native costume, and the varied productions of their country which they brought, were curious and strange. The interest produced by their visit was evinced in the general sympathy awakened by their illness and death, and by the apprehension, almost universally entertained, that suspicion would arise in the minds of the affectionate people whom they had left behind that they had fallen victims to some unfair treatment in England, and perhaps had suffered in revenge for the death of Capt. Cook, who had been murdered half a century before on their own shores. The costly and delicate respect shown by the British government to the bereaved nation, in despatching the Blonde frigate, commanded by a nobleman, to convey the bodies of the king and queen that they might be deposited in the sepulchres of their ancestors, and that the nation might have the melancholy satisfaction of paying the last tribute of affection to the remains of their departed rulers, tended in no small degree to give a salutary direction to the sensations to which their sudden decease had given birth. These combined circumstances have secured to the Sandwich Islands a greater degree of attention than had been manifested since the announcement of their discovery, or the publication of those fascinating accounts of their natural beauty and the interesting circumstances of their inhabitants, which were at that period given to the public.

The pleasing and, in many instances, decisive change that has taken place in the moral and religious state of the people is by no means the least important circumstance connected with the Sandwich islands. It has furnished occasion for grateful acknowledgments to Almighty God from all who duly appreciate the benefits conferred by our holy religion on any nation by which it is received, whether barbarous or civilized. It has afforded fresh encouragement to all interested or engaged in its propagation throughout the world, and has augmented the evidence already possessed of the adaptation of Christianity to improve the condition of mankind, and its tendency to elevate their intellectual and moral character and to ameliorate their present condition, whilst it inspires them with the hopes of immortality.

The writer of the following sheets is one of a small body of missionaries from America, whom the most disinterested benevolence led to those islands for the purpose of attempting to communicate to the unenlightened minds of the inhabitants the principles of human knowledge and inspired truths. Although allied to families of the first respectability in America, and favored with the fairest prospects of realizing all he could desire in his profession at home, he relinquished them, and devoted himself to the service of his Saviour among the heathen :

Denied to self, to earthly fame
Denied, and earthly wealth, he kindred left,
And home, and ease, and all the cultivated joys,
Convenient and delicate delights
Of ripe society.

Between three and four years he had resided in the islands, principally in Maui, had acquired the language, became familiar with the habits and character of the people, and having surmounted the difficulties inseparable from the first period of a missionary's residence among uncivilized heathens, was looking forward with confidence to years of delightful occupation and extensive usefulness, when the distressing illness of Mrs. Stewart became so alarming as to leave no doubt that the only hope of life was in her immediate removal to a colder and more congenial climate. No means of conveyance to the United States were at that time at hand ; and the symptoms of her disorder became so urgent, that the least delay threatened to be fatal even to the faint hope they were allowed to indulge.

At this critical period, a British ship, the Fawn, bound for London, providentially put into Oahu for refreshments ; and the master, Capt. Dale, generously offered Mr. Stewart and his family a gratuitous passage to England, where they would meet with every facility for proceeding to America. In April, 1826, they arrived in London ; and although Mrs. Stewart's health was materially improved by the voyage, it was deemed expedient that she should endeavor in some degree to recruit her strength before embarking for her native country. This circumstance, while it detained them from their friends in America, afforded the directory and officers of the Missionary Society, with many other friends of the missionary cause, an opportunity of becoming acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Stewart. I shall only add that the result of this intercourse was an impression most favorable to the character of the visitors, which is still varied and delightful to the recollection of many.

Their arrival excited mingled emotions in my own mind. I could not but sympathize with them under an afflictive dispensation, the bitterness of which I had myself so fully tasted; yet the feeling of regret on this account was somewhat counterbalanced by the satisfaction I enjoyed in their society during the interesting period of our public anniversaries in May. Mr. Stewart and myself attended most of the public meetings together, and in the proceedings of several we both took a share; a fact that brought powerfully to my recollection the services similar in kind, yet very different in their accompanying circumstances, in which we had so often unitedly engaged in the Sandwich islands.

After about three months residence in England, Mr. Stewart with his family embarked for America. He has since been employed in visiting, on behalf of the American Missionary Society, different sections of the United States, and advocating the cause of Christian missions. A residence in her native land has somewhat improved Mrs. Stewart's health; but while both are anxious to resume their labors at the Sandwich islands, it is by no means so far established as to afford any immediate prospect of embarkation.

During the period of Mr. Stewart's residence in the Sandwich islands, events transpired there of deeper interest and higher importance than those that had happened in any former period of their history; and his letters respecting the Sandwich Island Mission,* which have appeared in Mr. Orme's Defence of the Missions in the Pacific, are so clear and satisfactory, that they must have predisposed all by whom they have been read, to feel interested in the perusal of whatever, in connection with these islands, may proceed from his pen.

*In answer to the London Quarterly Review. For these letters see the Appendix to this volume.

Respecting the establishment of the first permanent mission in Hawaii and Maui ; the conversion, baptism, and death of Keopuolani, the first Hawaiian convert ; the first admission of natives to the Christian church ; the remarkable and general attention paid to instruction ; the character of the present young prince and princess of the Sandwich islands ; the determination of the late king to visit Great Britain ; the flagrant outrages of several Europeans who have visited the islands ; the first intelligence received by the natives of the death of the king and queen ; the arrival of the bodies of the deceased sovereign and his consort ; the honorable conduct of lord Byron ; the circumstances connected with the visit of the Blonde ; and the eruption of the great volcano, which took place during an excursion, which, in company with lord Byron and a party of officers and gentlemen from the Blonde, he made to this grand and stupendous natural phenomenon — Mr. Stewart has furnished a mass of information that cannot fail to be deeply interesting.

I have read his journal with great pleasure, and doubt not it will be very favorably received, even should my warm attachment to the writer have led me to found a partial opinion of its merits. Of this, however, the public will decide. For myself, I must confess I esteem the friendship I formed with Mr. Stewart and his family in the Sandwich islands, among the happiest of the many pleasing events connected with my transient labors there. The striking resemblance between our circumstances has also united our hearts. We have both, from the same painful cause, been obliged to leave interesting and important fields of labor. Mr. Stewart on his way home spent some time in Britain, while I could only reach England by way of America. We have both been engaged, since our return, in promoting the interest of the missionary enterprise ; are at length both favored with some faint hopes of resuming our labors ; are cheered by the anticipations of meeting again in our former stations, and combining our efforts in promoting the best interests of the inhabitants of Hawaii, with those of our colleagues who have been privileged to remain on the field.

The progress of Christianity among the people, and their gradual improvement in morality, intelligence, and civilization, have not been less decisive and encouraging since the departure of Mr.

Stewart, than they were during his residence in the islands. Since his return, the instruction of the inhabitants has produced so rapid an advancement in the acquisition of useful knowledge as to awaken feelings of astonishment and delight. On the island of Maui, in the year 1826, not less than eight thousand scholars received instruction in the schools; and it was presumed that, with a larger supply of books, the number might be increased. Forty schools existed in Hawaii; and the missionaries, in writing to America, express their conviction, that had they the means of extending their schools, ten thousand might in the course of the year be taught to read with facility and correctness the word of God in their own language. Early in the same year, sixty-nine schools, containing between two and three thousand scholars, attended a public examination at Honolulu. And during the preceding year, 1825, seventy-eight thousand and four hundred spelling-books and tracts had issued from the press. In January, 1827, the schools in the same island contained eight thousand, three hundred and three scholars. The translation of the Gospel by Matthew was finished about the same time, and, having been revised by the missionaries, was sent to America, where it will probably be printed by the American Bible Society, and forwarded to the islands; twenty thousand copies of which, it is estimated, may be advantageously distributed among the people of Hawaii alone.

The progress of a work so decisive in its nature, and so extensive in its influence, affecting not only the religious, civil, and political institutions of the people, but changing entirely the principles and habits which had heretofore marked their intercourse with those by whom they were occasionally or periodically visited, would, it was natural to expect, be branded with opprobrium, and resisted with virulence, by those whose interests it would oppose and whose inclinations it would restrain. This has been the case; and, indeed, had it not been so, the moral change that has taken place in these islands would have wanted one of the strongest demonstrations of that unequivocal origin and character under which it now appears before the world. Some account of the nature and causes of the opposition to that process, which is now rapidly transforming the face of Hawaiian society, will be met with in the following sheets. Numerous additional instances might be cited, were it necessary, to show the influence of missionary efforts in restraining the vices, and proportionably diminishing the miseries, of the people. But I am convinced that those recorded in Mr. Stewart's volume, with others already before the public, will be sufficient to remove whatever erroneous impressions may have thereby been made from any minds open to conviction and influenced in reference to missionary efforts, only by the simple declarations of honest truth. I was recently informed by an officer, who, in his majesty's ship Cornwallis, visited Hawaii some few years ago, that not less than four hundred females came on board the vessel on the night of her anchoring in one of the harbors ; but such is the change since that time, that when the Blonde arrived, not one female ascended her sides. Yet so violent has the opposition been in the islands, that the persons and the lives of the missionaries have only been safe under the protection of bodies of armed natives, by whom their dwellings have been surrounded and defended.

The most injurious misrepresentations have also been circulated both in England and America, by those of whom better things might have been expected ; and it is greatly to be regretted, that a leading literary journal,* in our own metropolis, should have so far indulged its prejudices as even to hazard its claim to public confidence in the correctness of its communications, by giving its authority as the verification of a document bearing the marks of improbability and self-refutation on the very front of its assertions. It will be evident that I refer to the fabricated letter from Boki, the chief, and which appeared in the beginning of 1827. Convinced, as soon as I saw the letter, that it had not been written by the individual whose name was appended to it, I communicated to the editor my reasons for believing he had been mistaken, at least, in supposing it genuine. In the following number I received a public reply, asserting "that the letter certainly did come from the Sandwich islands," — which I had never questioned — and stating at the same time, "that its genuineness neither has been, nor is, doubted either by the officer of the Blonde who received it, or by his Captain." This statement being at entire variance with a communication I had received from lord Byron personally, I wrote to ask his lordship's opinion, and received shortly afterwards, in reference to that part of my letter, the following reply :

* London Quarterly Review.

"You ask my opinion respecting the letter said to be written by our friend Boki, and signed with his name. I have no hesitation in saying, that I do not believe Boki either wrote or dictated that letter. It is not his manner of expressing himself, and you are aware that he can scarcely form his letters. I do not mean to say that the letter did not come from the islands, but it certainly was manufactured by some other person."

This answer, which his lordship has so obligingly returned, is decisive, and shews most distinctly the snare into which the editor of the Quarterly Review has fallen on this point, as well as on other matters in relation to the Sandwich islands. I should not have alluded to these facts, but from the connection in which they stand with this volume ; and from the republication of the suppositious letter from the islands in other periodicals, and the daily papers, and the extensive circulation thus given to it through the country. It is therefore an act of justice to give the public the means of correcting any erroneous opinion which may have been formed ; although, to every unprejudiced mind, the letter itself would convey an antidote to the poison it was designed to instil.

A RESIDENCE IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE GROUP.

THE Sandwich Islands are situated, in the Pacific ocean, between $18^{\circ} 50'$ and $22^{\circ} 20'$ north latitude, and between $154^{\circ} 53'$ and $160^{\circ} 15'$ west longitude from Greenwich. They are about 2800 miles distant from the coast of Mexico on the east; about 5000 from the shores of China on the west; and 2700 from the Society Islands on the south.

The islands are ten in number, stretching, as may be seen from a chart, in a flattened curve, E. S. E. and W. N. W. in the following order: HA-WAI-I, MAU-I, MO-LO-KI-NI, KA-HU-LA-WE, LA-NAI, MO-LO-KAI, O-A-HU, KAU-AI, NI-HAU, and KAU-LA.

HAWAII, the most southern and eastern island, is the largest of the group. It is about ninety-seven miles long; seventy-eight broad — covering a surface of 4000 square miles, and containing 85,000 inhabitants.

MAUI lies north-west from Hawaii, and is separated from it by a channel twenty-four miles wide. This island formed by two mountainous peninsulas, connected by a narrow neck of low land, is forty-eight miles long, and at its greatest width twenty-nine miles wide. It covers about 600 square miles, and is supposed to have a population of 20,000 people.

MOLOKINI is a barren rock, rising only fifteen or twenty feet above the level of the ocean, at a distance of four or five miles from the western shore of the southern peninsula of Maui. KAHULAWA lies in the same direction from Maui, six or eight miles beyond Molokini. It is only eleven miles long and eight broad, and has but few inhabitants.

LANAI is situated twenty miles north-west from Kahulawe, and ten or twelve miles directly west from the northern peninsula of Maui. It is seventeen miles long and nine broad, covering about 110 square miles, with a population of 2000 or 3000.

MOLOKAI lies west-north-west from Maui, and is separated from it by a channel ten miles wide. A passage of about the same width divides it on the south from Lanai. Molokai is forty miles long and seven broad, covering 170 square miles, and containing three or four thousand inhabitants.

OAHU lies twenty-seven miles north-west from Molokai, is forty-six miles in length and twenty-three in breadth, with a surface of 520 square miles, and a population of 20,000. It affords the best harbor in the group, and is the most fertile and beautiful of the islands.

KAUAI is seventy-five miles north-west from Oahu. It is thirty-three miles long and twenty-eight broad, covering 520 square miles, and has about 10,000 inhabitants.

NIHAU lies south-west from Kauai fifteen miles, and is twenty miles long and seven broad. The number of its inhabitants is small. KAULA, situated seventeen miles south-west of Nihau, like Molokini, is an uninhabited rock, visited only for the eggs of sea-fowl which frequent it in great numbers, and there hatch their young.

These islands were discovered in the year 1778, by captain James Cook of the British navy; and from him, in honor of earl Sandwich, then first lord of the admiralty, received the name by which they are at present designated. The tragical and lamented death of this celebrated navigator at Hawaii, in the succeeding year, caused their existence to be made known to the civilized world with an excitement of feeling that deeply stamped the event on the public mind.

No foreign ship visited the group again until the year 1786, when the ill-fated La Perouse touched at Maui; and about the same time two vessels, engaged in the trade of the North-west Coast, procured refreshments at the island of Oahu. These were early succeeded by several others; and in 1792 and 1794 by the expedition under the command of Vancouver.

At the time of their discovery, the four principal islands, Hawaii, Maui, Oahu and Kauai, were governed by separate and independent kings; but within the ten years preceding Vancouver's visit, KA-MEHA-MEHA — originally a chief of inferior rank, possessing only one or two districts in Hawaii, a man, however, of ambitious spirit and great powers both of body and mind — had, by his talent and prowess, not only secured to himself the sovereignty of his native island, but was then pushing his conquests to the islands of Maui and Oahu. During the sanguinary conflicts attending this usurpation, some of the chiefs, apprized by their intercourse with the few ships that had then been at the islands of the importance of guns and fire-arms in a time of warfare, and sensible of the superiority that would be given to the party who could gain the possession of a foreign vessel, had made treacherous and violent attacks upon several traders, and in one instance were unhappily successful in seizing an American schooner, and in putting her crew to death.

Kamehameha, too wise not to perceive the bad policy of attempting in this manner to avail himself of the advantages of his visitors, adopted a course directly opposite; and by his unwearied kindness and every pledge of friendship, endeavored to secure their confidence and good will. This policy in an especial manner characterized his treatment of Vancouver; and in 1794 he formally ceded to this commander, as the representative of the British nation, the island of Hawaii, in expression of his respect for that government and a desire to have the protection of its power. In return, Vancouver aided this chieftain in building a small vessel, which was of essential service in his future expeditions; and in the course of the succeeding year, by the death in battle of the king of Oahu, he became the uncontrolled master of the windward islands. The king of Kauai and Nihau, intimidated by the success and invincible power of Kamehameha, despatched an embassy to him, on this event, with a surrender of himself as a tributary prince; and the supreme government of the whole group became thus established in the hands of the conqueror.

This great political change, with the known kindness of the king to foreigners, opened the way to a safe and increasing intercourse with the American and European nations. The number of vessels, especially American merchantmen, touching at the Sandwich islands, soon became very considerable; and the discovery of the protected and excellent harbor of Honolulu, in the island of Oahu, which had escaped the vigilant search of Vancouver in his survey of the coast, caused them to become to ships in general, traversing the north Pacific, a place of resort for undergoing repairs, obtaining water and other refreshments.

Sandal wood, an article of value in the Chinese market, was discovered in the mountains of the different islands, and soon became the means on the part of Kamehameha of extensive commerce with foreigners. The articles of barter first given in exchange by traders were of the rudest kind: such as pieces of iron hoop, nails, coarse cloth, &c. &c. Then knives, hatchets and axes; guns, muskets and ammunition; and eventually whole cargoes of rich American and Chinese goods, and vessels of various sizes, from small schooners to brigs of upwards of a hundred tons burden.

By this intercourse with the inhabitants of other nations; by the partial introduction among the chiefs of European and Asiatic manufactures; by the erection of fortifications; and by the purchase, equipment and management of ships, promise was given of at least a degree of future civilization.

Early in the present century, the natives began occasionally to enter into the service of foreign vessels as seamen, and in this manner several made their way to the United States. In the number was Obookiah — more correctly Obukahaia — an individual whose name and character is now extensively known, and whose wanderings were made, in the wise providence of God, to result in consequences of unspeakable importance, not only to himself, but to his whole nation.

This lad arrived at the city of New York, in the year 1809, and shortly afterwards became an inmate, at New-Haven, Connecticut, of the family of the commander of the ship in which he had made his voyage. He was naturally of an observing and inquisitive mind; and the wide contrast presented by civilized and Christian people with the ignorant and degraded idolaters of his own nation, made a deep impression upon him. Having learned the design of the extensive edifices of Yale College, he frequently visited the grounds of that institution, and was at length discovered weeping at the entrance of one of the buildings. The cause of his tears was ascertained to be a sense of his own ignorance, and an anxious desire for instruction. A gentlemen of intelligence and piety immediately received him as a private pupil. He made rapid advances in knowledge—became a sincere convert to Christianity—and, fired with zeal for the salvation of his countrymen, began to qualify himself to return to his native islands for the purpose of making known the existence of the only true God, and the redemption that is in Jesus Christ.

The character of Obukahaia was early reported to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a society formed in the year 1810 for the propagation of the gospel among the heathen. This information led to the establishment of an institution at Cornwall, Connecticut, called the "Foreign Mission School," for the education of pagan youth found on our shores, preparatory to their being returned as teachers to their respective countries. Here Obukahaia was placed; and other Sandwich-islanders were found and entered on the same foundation.

Among them was a young chief, George Tamoree, or Kaumualii, son of Kaumualii, the tributary king of Kauai. Eight or ten years previously, his father had sent him, when only nine years old, to America to be educated. The sea-captain who had charge of him had been provided by the king with the means of meeting the necessary expenditures, but dying suddenly within the year of his arrival, without designating these funds, they were lost in the wreck of his own fortune. George, permitted to wander from a school at which he had been placed, enlisted in the naval service of the United States. On his discharge, at the close of the late war, he was discovered at the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, identified as the son of Kaumualii, and removed to Cornwall for education.

Obukahaia, unhappily, as was thought, for the proposed introduction of Christianity at the Sandwich islands, died before completing his course of instruction, in February, 1818. But the event excited so great and so general an interest in the American churches, that by it the way became more speedily prepared for sending a Christian mission to his native shores than might otherwise have been the case; and in the autumn of 1819, a company of missionaries under the patronage of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, embarked from the city of Boston for that destination.

It consisted of the Rev. Mr. Bingham and Rev. Mr. Thurston, ordained ministers of the gospel; Mr. Ruggles and Mr. Whitney, catechists and teachers; Dr. Holman a physician, Mr. Loomis a printer, and Mr. Chamberlain an agriculturist, all married men. And of the Sandwich islanders, John Honolii, Thomas Hopu, William Kenui and George Kaumualii. George was returned to his father by the missionary society, as a passenger only, without any official connexion with the mission family.

The affecting death of captain Cook, and the massacre of several other foreigners at a later period, had deeply impressed the public mind with a belief that the Sandwich-islanders were more barbarous and sanguinary than most other islanders of the Pacific. The unvarying testimony of voyagers who had visited them, when consulted in reference to the contemplated mission, had been — “The natives are too much addicted to their pagan customs ever to give them up. They will never abandon their sacrifices and kabus. The missionaries may attempt to convert them, but they can never succeed; they will be robbed and driven away, even if they escape violence and death.”

It was with just reason, therefore, that the society under whose auspices this enterprise had been projected, waited with deep solicitude for the period when they might hear of the arrival of this devoted company at their destination, and of the character of their reception by the people. Seventeen months elapsed before this anxiously desired moment came. But though the suspense had been long, it was broken by sounds of gladness which yet vibrate joyfully on the ears of many who look for the coming of the kingdom of God.

The missionaries had not only made the islands in safety, but the first word of intelligence that reached their vessel was in the astonishing and, to them, overwhelming exclamation, "THE GODS OF HAWAII ARE NO MORE! — KAMEHAMEHA IS DEAD — LIHOLIHO IS KING — THE KABU IS ABOLISHED — AND THE TEMPLES AND IDOLS ARE DESTROYED!"

Liholiho, the eldest son of the conqueror of Hawaii, had ascended the throne, and the very opening of his reign had been marked by a measure which is without a parallel in the history of the world. A pagan king, unbidden and uninstructed, had in a day cast off all the gods of his people, and by a single stroke of boldness, overthrown a superstition which for ages had held a degraded race in the bondage of fear.

The idolatry of the Sandwich-islanders was of a form peculiar to the Polynesians, called TABU, or kabu, from an appendage to the ordinary worship of images, expressed by that term, so singular in its nature as justly to give name to the whole system. The kabu, though intimately connected with the services of religion, did not consist of any fixed and unchanging observances, but was uncertain and arbitrary in its requisitions. It was an instrument of power, in the possession of the priests and king, which might be made to assume any shape which interest, passion, or even caprice might dictate, and to extend to all things civil as well as religious. And every breach of kabu being punishable with death, it was a system under which the people were governed as with a rod of iron.

The word itself has generally been considered by foreigners as synonymous with the English word prohibition. But its literal and peculiar meaning implies a consecration. Thus the priests, the king, the chiefs, who claimed descent from the gods, and the temples, were kabu. So also an animal, or cluster of fruit, or other article set apart for sacrifice — and a day, week or month, appropriated to the worship of the gods.

The kabus varied greatly, both in extent and duration. Sometimes a single tree, or a single animal only, would be made kabu, and at others a whole grove or herd; sometimes a single house, or piece of land, or fishing-ground; at others a whole district, or even island. Sometimes the kabu would be limited to a day, at others would continue for weeks and months. Kabus of time varied in the degree of rigor with which they were to be observed; sometimes requiring only a cessation from ordinary work and amusement; at others an entire seclusion, when to be seen abroad was death. Every fire, too, must then be extinguished; every sound, even to the crowing of a cock or barking of a dog, prevented; and the silence and desolation of death be made to reign throughout the whole extent of the kabu, whether of district or island.

But though thus various in its features and changeable in its forms, there were points in the kabu which were general and unalterable. One of these was the kabu of all the best kinds of food for sacrifice to the gods, and for the use of the men: the women were thus excluded from the use of hogs, fowls, cocoa-nuts, bananas, several kinds of fish, &c. &c. Another was a kabu excluding the females from the houses of the men. A woman was not permitted to enter the habitation even of her father or husband, nor to eat in company of any man. These were the points, a breach of which, Liholiho determined to make the signal for the abolition of the whole, and for the downfall of idolatry.

Having secretly consulted the high priest and principal chiefs upon the subject, and gained their consent and co-operation, he made a great entertainment, in the month of November, 1819, to which all the foreign traders, mercantile agents, and residents, then at the islands, were invited, together with the whole company of chiefs. Two long tables, one for males and another for females, in conformity to the kabu, were spread in an open bower, around which a great concourse of common people assembled. After the food has been served up, and all the company had taken their seats, the king, evidently much agitated, arose with a dish of the food denied to females in his hand, and walking first round the table of the men, as if to see that all were properly provided, hastily turned to that of the women, and seating himself between two of his queens, began to eat with them from the dish he had carried. At this, the whole astonished multitude burst into the exclamation, AI NOA ! AI NOA ! (ai, food — noa, common, or general, in contradistinction to ai tabu — food sacred.) The high priest himself rushed to fire an adjoining temple; and messengers were instantly despatched in all directions to perpetrate a similar conflagration. In a very few days, every heathen temple in the group was mouldering in ashes; and the idols, which had not shared the same fate, were cast useless on the beach, or reserved merely as objects of curiosity.

That it was the pleasure of the king, thus to cast off the kabu, and to abolish idolatry, seemed sufficient to satisfy the minds of the people. One ambitious young chief of rank, however, attempted by it to excite the natives to a rebellion, in the hope of securing the sovereignty to himself; but, in this he was unsuccessful; his party was defeated, and himself and wife slain in battle, in the winter of 1820.

The causes which led Liholiho to a determination so bold and so important, are not fully known: but probably were, a conviction of the falsity of idolatry, derived from an intercourse with foreigners and from the indifference, if not contempt, they may have manifested for the gods and sacrifices of his nation; a knowledge of the destruction of the idols at the Society Islands, by a people known to him to be altogether like his own; and strong attachment for his queens, who were restricted in their privileges and enjoyments by the kabu. Whatever may have been the immediate cause or causes of this singular event, the pious heart will recognize in it the hand of Him who doeth all things according to his good pleasure, and who only can, "IN THE WILDERNESS, PREPARE THE WAY OF THE LORD AND MAKE STRAIGHT, IN THE DESERT, A HIGHWAY FOR OUR GOD."

The intelligence thus communicated from the shore prepared the missionaries for a favorable reception by the king and government. They were early and happily established on the islands of Hawaii, Oahu, and Kauai; and with such prospects of immediate and wide-spreading usefulness, that the first communications from them to their patrons were accompanied by an earnest application for more missionaries.

This application was repeated again and again, and, in the year 1822, was complied with by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in the selection of a reinforcement, consisting of three ordained ministers: the Rev. Mr. Bishop, Rev. Mr. Richards, and the writer of this sketch; two licensed preachers, Mr. Ely and Mr. Goodrich; Dr. Blatchely a physician, all married men; Mr. Levi Chamberlain, agent for secular affairs; Betsey Stockton, a colored female of education and piety, who had attached herself to Mrs. Stewart as a domestic and assistant missionary; and three Sandwich-islanders, from the foreign mission school at Cornwall — Stephen Pupuhi, Richard Kalaïoula, and William Kamahoula.

Their embarkation took place on board the ship Thames in the harbor of New-Haven, on Tuesday the 19th of November, 1822; immediately after which, the following journal was commenced.

CHAPTER II.

VOYAGE TO THE ISLANDS.

Ship Thames, at sea, Nov. 22, 1822. The letters of the 20th instant, sent on shore by the pilot, will inform you, dear M——, of the manner in which the first day of our embarkation was spent. Our ship, from the gentleness of her motion, seemed less willing than ourselves to exchange the smooth waters of the Sound, and the rich and cheerful landscapes along the shores of Connecticut and Long Island, for the troubled bosom and unbroken horizon of the ocean; and it was not till yesterday morning, at day-break, that we passed Montauk Point, and gained the open sea.

A few hours afterwards we lost sight of Block Island, the last land in view; without scarce noticing it, however, from the excessive sickness which had already seized most of our number. H— is extremely ill, so much so as to be almost entirely insensible ; but I have escaped altogether, and thus happily have it in my power to devote my whole attention to her. The wind yesterday was fresh, and the sea rough ; but to-day the weather is much more boisterous. Since evening we have had heavy squalls, with occasional dashes of rain, and there is now every appearance of an approaching gale.

Saturday, 23. After taking reef on reef, and furling sail after sail, during the night, it became necessary this morning, from the violence of the storm, to heave the ship to, and let her drift with the wind. The scene is new and terrific. The dead-lights are in : and besides the gloom thus thrown over all below, the cabin has been made still more comfortless by a heavy sea which broke over the ship, and poured a torrent of water down the companion-way. Everything not strongly lashed is driving from one side to the other, while we ourselves, some seated on the floor, some on trunks and boxes, and others braced in our berths, are obliged to cling to whatever is within reach, to prevent being dashed about in the same manner. The wind howls dismally through the spars and rigging, and every wave that rushes along the sides of the vessel, or breaks above the bulwarks and thunders over our heads, seems to threaten destruction.

At 9 o'clock I went on deck. I had anticipated a scene of grandeur, but its sublimity and fearfulness far surpassed my expectation. No description can convey a just impression of it to your mind. Imagine for a moment, the hills of Otsego to be rolling in every direction, with high and broken swells over the lake and valley. Just so monstrous appear the billows that rage around us. We are in the gulf stream, and the current and storm being in opposite directions, the waves are not only high and heavy, but irregular in their course, and so rapid in succession, that, before the ship in her descent is half way down the abyss between them, the next sea often collects to a tremendous height above her bowsprit, over which it appears impossible for her to rise. Still she as often mounts its threatening waters, and rides in triumph on their summit. But the labor is excessive, and, as she plunges from the top of one wave to the gulf below, and after a momentary pause rushes again to the height of another, every timber groans in the effort, and at times she trembles to her keel, as if foundering in the struggle.

I was above, when she made the most fearful plunge we have yet felt. Several of the crew were, at the time, securing the flying-jib-boom, and, with the bowsprit and whole head of the ship, were instantly buried in a mountain of water. An involuntary shriek, as their hats were seen sweeping topmast-high on the passing wave, expressed the fear that they too were hurried to destruction. But happily they maintained their hold, and, though bruised and breathless, escaped a watery grave.

Never before have I been so deeply impressed, as in this conflict with the elements, with the insignificance of man as a creature, in the sight of Him who "commandeth the winds and the waves, and they obey him." A momentary unbelief would persuade me to think myself too unimportant an object to share in the protecting power of such a Being. How happy for us the assurance, that every hair of our heads is numbered, and that without Him not even a sparrow falleth to the ground! All the fortitude of the Christian is requisite, to preserve an ordinary degree of composure, amidst the terrors of the Almighty, as thus displayed in the wonders of the deep; how is it, that the careless and ungodly sinner can behold them, and not tremble!

Evening. The storm has rapidly abated, and we are again under sail; but the sea is still dreadfully high, and almost every wave washes our decks.

Sabbath, 24. The weather continues too tempestuous to allow of any religious service; and our Sabbath and sanctuary must be those of the heart alone. But though denied the peculiar privileges of the day, we are cheered by the persuasion, that we are not forgotten by our already distant friends, who have gone up to the courts of the Lord, renewedly "to be satisfied with the fatness of his house," and "to drink of the river of his pleasures."

The remembrance of Sabbaths in a Christian land, now past to us forever, has been accompanied by recollections of home of the deepest tenderness. For the first time since we sailed, I have felt the reality of my separation from all I have held dearest on earth ; and, as the conviction has pressed itself upon my soul, friend after friend has crowded on my imagination, till I have escaped agony of heart only by hurrying my thoughts to that world of gladness where there will be no more separation, and from whence "sorrow and sighing shall forever flee away." O, how happy, how glorious the hope of an interminable meeting there ! Would to God that all the objects of love, on whom the warm remembrance of this day has rested, had secured this hope to their souls "as an anchor sure and steadfast ;" then, though widely dispersed, we should pass safely through all the tempests of life, and ride securely together, at last, in the haven of eternal rest !

Tuesday, 26. We have to-day been gratified by an incident, always cheering to those at sea, that of speaking a ship homeward bound. Animation beamed from every eye, as the cry, "Sail ho !" echoed from voice to voice. A fine ship, under full sail, is a noble object, and we watched our mutual and rapid approach with delight. She proved to be the William Penn, of Philadelphia ; and, as we rushed past each other, we requested to be reported, "All's well — a week at sea," and followed her with our best wishes and prayers.

Saturday, 30. Another severe gale of wind compelled us to lay-to the whole of Thursday night, and part of yesterday. Confinement to the cabin, and the tossing of the ship, has greatly increased H——'s sickness. She has indeed been very, very ill ; so much so, as even to excite at times, serious apprehensions of the result. She has scarce opened her eyes, or spoken a word, since we gained the open sea ; and has suffered more in that period than in all her life before.

This has led me to reflect what my thoughts and feelings will be when I shall see her enduring all the privations of the missionary life — should she be spared to meet them. When I look back a fortnight, and view her as she then was, healthful, blooming, and animated, with happiness beaming on every feature, and behold her now, pale, emaciated, and spiritless, from a sickness which might have been avoided, I am ready to ask myself,

"Could it have been my duty thus to expose one so delicate and refined, and so unused to fatigue and hardship?" Something within me would answer, "No, it could not." But it is not the spirit of the Christian, nor of the minister, nor of the missionary; all these, more promptly and more decisively exclaim, "It could and it is." Yes, whatever I myself, whatever H—— may suffer, I am fully persuaded that I have done right, and that she has done right, in forming the determination and in pursuing the measures we have. We are not on a warfare at our own charge; nor do we undertake to build, not having counted the cost. We have engaged in this enterprise, not from a sudden impulse of unenlightened enthusiasm, but from a long process of reasoning, which we trust will bear the scrutiny equally of philosophy and religion.

Did self-enjoyment constitute the highest object and blessing of our present existence, in "the elegant sufficiency" of an American home, with "Friendship, books, Ease, and alternate labor,"

we could have been so well satisfied as scarce to have wished for a change, even to that "better country" whose fullness, only, can meet the desires of an immortal spirit. But while such is not the case, and, next to the salvation of our own souls, the glory of God and the good of man ought to be our chief concern, we most willingly bid farewell to all the charms of civilized life, and welcome the simplicity and rudeness of a missionary hut, if thereby we can most fully achieve these great ends of existence.

If the Bible be true—and where our souls can confidently repose, every minor good may be securely trusted—we fear no evil in this measure, except that which may arise from the deceitfulness of the human heart. To me, the duty involved in Christian missions to the heathen, is clear as the sun at noon-day; and to deny it, is, in my opinion, at once, to oppose the whole spirit and genius of our faith, as well as expressly to reject the authority of the scriptures. Unto the Gentiles the gospel of Jesus must be preached. On whom, then, does the obligation of this necessity fall? I answer, on those ministers of the cross, at least, who can devote themselves to the work without neglecting or forsaking a prior and superior duty incompatible with the undertaking; and who are not disqualified by physical or other causes, from entering upon it. Of this number, after a careful and, I may add, at the time, unwelcome examination, I proved myself to my own conscience to be one. And what reason could I plead, why an exemption should be granted to me? Could I say: "My attachment to my family and friends, to my home and country, are too strong—I cannot tear myself from them?" The same argument might be equally urged by all others; and he who trusted in it might justly apprehend the righteous judgment of Heaven on the heart that loved the objects of its earthly affection more than it feared its Maker. Could I plead the too great sacrifice of the indulgences and elegancies of life? In so doing, by what data could I discriminate between a supreme attachment to these and "that friendship of the world which is enmity with God;" and how well might I dread the sentence, "Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of thee." No plea could stand the test, and it was only left for me to say, "Lord, here am I; send me."

This surrender was not made, I admit, without a struggle; not the struggle of a day, nor of an hour, but of months: and a struggle of agony too; but, thanks be to God, it was that also of triumph; and from the moment of victory, all within my own bosom on this point has been peace.

Both myself and H—— have acted in this matter only in conformity to the precepts of the gospel, to the dictates of reason and conscience, and to the leadings of the providence of God. We may find that the hand that guides bears the rod to afflict; still we will fear no evil; blessings rich and satisfying will arise in the path of duty, if not in one form, in others perhaps less expected, but not less full.

With these views of the subject, and they are those of our inmost hearts, we cheerfully turn forever from the comfort, the social happiness, and refined enjoyments we might so fully have secured in our native land, and welcome with contentment the self-denial and privation, the toil and care we have in prospect. Whatever else we lose, we make sure, we trust, of treasures too rich to be exchanged or forfeited for all the fleeting and unsubstantial pleasures of the world. When we recount our sufferings, then, — when we give a candid statement of our situation, however afflictive it may be, — do not think that we consider it strange that such things have befallen us, but that, deeming the service we perform as done unto the Lord, we even “count for joy” the trials that may await us in its accomplishment.

Our humble friend B—— daily proves more and more kind, affectionate and faithful. She has been most thoughtful and assiduous in her attentions to H——, and we regard her as an invaluable acquisition to our family.

The weather now is delightful; the air as mild and balmy as that of a morning in May. The sea too is less disturbed than at any time since we came out. Indeed, until Saturday we were in a constant gale. You can scarce imagine the difference made in everything by the change. Before, we could scarce see two hundred yards for the green billows heaping in mountains around us; now we can look in any direction to a distance of many miles over a beautiful surface of deep blue, variegated here and there by the snowy curvings of a breaking wave.

Contrary to my expectation, I find no difficulty in profitably employing my time on board ship. In this I am happily disappointed; from what I had heard of sea-life, I was fearful the voyage would prove almost a blank. We are quite systematic in our regulations as a family. The bell for rising is rung in the cabin at sunrise, and that for morning prayers at half past seven o'clock. We breakfast at eight, dine at one, take tea at six, and have evening worship immediately after the setting of the first night-watch, that all the crew may attend.

The establishment of regular worship has been a source of much satisfaction; and the respectful attendance of the captain, officers and crew, gives us sincere pleasure. When the weather permits, the evening service is held on the quarter-deck ; and it is sweet indeed, to hear our hymns of praise floating on the breeze, and to listen to the voice of prayer, addressed from the midst of these mighty waters, to Him who protects, and who only can defend and bless us.

Our other religious services are, a prayer-meeting in the forenoon of the Sabbath, and a sermon in the afternoon. Bible classes have also been established among the sailors. We cannot but hope, and do most fervently pray, that these means of grace may not be lost on the souls of those by whose skill we are enabled to bear the glad tidings of salvation to the distant islands of the ocean.

Dec. 4. We are at present nightly enjoying a lovely exhibition : that of moonlight at sea. At this season of the year, even in these mild latitudes, the queen of night ascends her throne through dark and wintry clouds floating on the horizon ; and for the last few evenings, I have stood, hour after hour, gazing at her as she has burst in all her glory from behind one or another of these dark masses, or from her concealment has fringed their edges with a splendor equal to her own.

“ Nor undelighted, in the solemn noon

have I watched her progress through the sky, while the mild radiance above and the playful reflection below have presented a scene of tranquility and peace unrivaled but in a vision of fancy. Then, too, our ship as she hastens on her course, looks more majestic than in the day ; her lofty masts seem from the deck to tower among the stars, and her full, swelling sails, tapering to their very tops, add no small degree of the beautiful to the sublime.

Dec. 9. Five days ago, we fell in company with the ship Winslow, of New-Bedford, bound, like ourselves, to the Pacific. We are still sailing within a short distance of each other. Arrangements were made for a religious service on board of her on the Sabbath ; and the novelty of an excursion, in a small boat in the midst of the Atlantic, was assigned to me. I was accompanied by captain Clasby and Mr. Chamberlain, and preached from the text, “ My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.” The whole ship's company, neatly dressed, attended on the quarter-deck, and appeared interested in the exercises. The crews of American whale ships are generally composed of respectable young men, of a class altogether superior to ordinary seamen. Intelligent, active and enterprising, they cannot be regarded with indifference; and I rejoiced in the opportunity of preaching to these the unsearchable riches of Christ. May it not be in vain! but may they hear, obey, and live! At the close of the sermon, Mr. Chamberlain furnished them with a quantity of tracts, and we returned to the Thames in time for the afternoon worship.

For the last few days we have been perfectly becalmed. A very heavy swell is at the same time rolling from the westward, giving to our ship a long, sluggish motion, almost as fatiguing as that in a gale.

Dec. 19. N. lat. 24 deg. W. long. 20 deg. During the last week, my taste for sea life has greatly increased; principally, perhaps, in consequence of the rapid and almost entire recovery of H—. She is quite herself again. The weather, too, has been delightful; the sky clear and mild, the wind fresh and fair, and our progress rapid and exhilarating.

Dec. 23. Just after breakfast yesterday, a shoal of large fish, a species of whale — Physeter Catodon — called blackfish by the crew, were descried close to our ship. H— and myself were walking on the quarter-deck at the time, and had a full view of them as they tumbled and spouted on their way, directly under the stern. Not less than fifty were in sight. Three of our boats were lowered and manned in a moment, and a chase after them commenced. At the distance of half a mile, we saw the darting of a harpoon; immediately after the water dashing high in the air; and then the boat oars “apeak,” rushing with astonishing velocity after the animal to which it was fastened. From a defect in the iron, however, this one was not secured. Shortly after, the first officer struck another, which instantly spouted a column of blood ten or fifteen feet high, and began plunging in the agonies of death. He threw his immense body almost entirely out of the water, and while dying, thrashed the waves until he was covered in a bed of foam.

All hands were engaged in towing the prey to the ship, when another shoal appeared just under our bows. A boat was quickly in the midst of them, as they sported along unconscious of danger; and one of the largest became alarmed only in time to receive a harpoon fully in his side, as he plunged round to escape it. He sprang once nearly his whole length into the air, and then diving into the deep was soon out of sight; but the swiftness with which the boat cut the waves after him, and the purple stream that marked its wake, told that the blow had been true. The boat continued to be hurried with the speed of a race-horse, first in one direction and then in another, for more than half an hour before the creature died.

With some exertion, both were brought alongside the ship, and hoisted upon deck. They were of one size, about twenty-one feet long, fifteen feet in circumference, and each weighing nearly three tons. The blubber was immediately cut off; and after reserving the livers and a few steaks, for the crew, the huge carcasses were launched again into the deep.

Unaccustomed to such feats, the whole scene was to us an exhibition of singular intrepidity. The process in taking a whale is precisely the same. The boats for this purpose are of the most light, and apparently fragile construction, formed to move with the utmost rapidity, and to ride even on the crest of a wave. The harpooner stands erect on the bow, with a firmness and gracefulness which practice only could secure, while the boat bounds from height to depth and from depth to height of the swelling sea. At a proper distance, his eye fixed on his victim, he darts the instrument with a force, which would seem, inevitably, to throw him from his narrow foot-hold into the water, while the floundering animal, writhing in the desperation of death, puts the boat in constant jeopardy.

The danger is by no means imaginary; many boats are destroyed, and many lives lost, in whaling voyages. The line, hundreds of yards in length, to which the harpoon is attached, is coiled in a tub in the fore part of the boat, and permitted to run off according to the power and speed of the whale to which it has been fastened; while one of the boatmen stands with a hatchet to cut it off, at a single blow, in case it should become entangled, as the delay of an instant, might prove fatal, and the boat be irresistibly taken down by the animal. It not unfrequently happens, that an arm or leg of some of the men is caught in the line, as it glides with the quickness of lightning from the tub, and, should not the limb be at once severed from the body by it, the wretch is, in a moment, hurried to an irrecoverable depth.

Our crew are engaged to-day in trying the blubber: for which purpose all whaling ships have a fixture of two or more large boilers and a furnace, on the fore deck. The oil of the blackfish is principally used by curriers in dressing leather: that now preparing is for our lamps, there having been a mistake in the quantity of spermaceti put on board the Thames for the voyage.

Dec. 24. For the last fortnight we have been anticipating the pleasure of touching, for a day, at one of the Cape de Verd islands; and, for the time, had almost lost sight of our more distant destination. Last night we supposed ourselves so much in the neighborhood of them, that we fully expected to hear the cry, "land ho!" early this morning. But instead of land, we have a heavy breeze, high sea, and thick and gloomy atmosphere. The uncertainty of our real distance from the group, the impossibility of getting an observation, and the threatening aspect of the weather, made the captain so doubtful of the prudence of running towards land, as to consult the passengers on the subject. We, of course, begged him to follow his own judgment; when, with one more inquisitive look to the windward, and an expressive shake of the head, he gave the command, "Up with the helm, and square the yards!" and, in five minutes from the first suggestion of sailing by, without our promised visit, we were running before the wind towards the equator, at the rate of ten miles an hour. A principal desire for stopping, had been, to send letters to America: and when I saw the ship actually about, and, in imagination, the land for which we had been so eagerly looking, fading in the distance, I felt a momentary regret and disappointment.

Saturday, 28. After a most rapid run of several days, we, this morning, reached "the swamp," as the captain calls the calm and rainy latitudes between the north-east and south-east trade winds, a few degrees north of the equator. Clouds and tempests seem gathered before us, having indeed, in point of gloom, the appearance of some of the dismal swamps of our own continent; and we begin to apprehend the proof of a geographical description I have seen stating that "the regions of the equator are given up to calms and rain—thunder, lightning, and water-spouts."

Evening. A violent squall has just swept over us; and before our sails could be secured, the lee bulwarks of the ship were nearly under water. Everything had an aspect more like that of a gale in the gulf stream, than at any time since. The wind rushed so loudly through the rigging, as to require a full exertion of lungs in the captain and mates to cause their orders to be heard, and the rain poured in torrents. Both wind and rain continue, in an abated degree, and the ship is still reefed down so as, in sea-phrasology, to be "all snug."

There is something in this state of things that produces a peculiar effect on my mind, and one which, you may be surprised to hear me say, is that of enjoyment. The low and scudding clouds—the driving rain—the sullen heavings of the ocean, and the roaring of the water at the prow—the rapidity with which we dash from wave to wave, while our lee-gunwales are almost buried in the deep—though they give, to all without, the aspect of suffering and of danger, induce a musing mood which I have found delightful. Everything on deck, too, has a like tendency: nothing generally is heard, but the creaking of the masts and yards, and the rattling of the cordage, while the officers, in their watchcoats, and tarpaulin caps, stand at their respective posts, and the sailors shelter themselves, from the worst of the storm, under the lee of the boats or weather bulwarks of the ship.

A situation of personal comfort, however, as well as a sense of safety, is essential to this kind of enjoyment: it is the contrast, indeed, thus afforded, that yields the principal pleasure. Feeling ourselves free from inconvenience and harm, we triumph over the ragings of the tempest, and forget the case of those who, unlike us, have no refuge from its fury.

Armstrong describes the same feeling, in reference to sleep, under circumstances familiar to every one —

“O when the growling winds contend, and all
The sounding forest fluctuates in the storm,
To sink in warm repose, and hear the din
Howl o'er the steady battlements, delights

Monday, Dec. 30. Within the last two days, we have, for the first time, had sight of a dolphin — one of the most beautiful of the inhabitants of the sea. The general length of this fish appears to be about two feet. In its shape it bears little resemblance to the representation of it seen on vases, and in marine emblems and armorial bearings, but is very similar to the white salmon-trout of the Otsego. When swimming in the water, its colors appear exceedingly delicate and beautiful. The head, back, and upper part of the sides, vary from the hues of burnished steel to that of deep azure and mazarine blue, shading off towards the under parts in pea-green and light yellow. The head fins are sky blue, and those of the tail pale green, terminating in yellow.

The dolphin is seldom taken with a hook and line; but, only a short time ago, one was struck with a harpoon, and brought on deck, and we all hastened to witness the reported splendor of its colors when dying. We found them to be as truly beautiful as they have been described; consisting of rapid transitions from the deepest purple, approaching to black, through blue, green, gold of different hues, and several shades of silver, to an almost snow-white, and then to purple again. The sight, however, was painful, from a kind of sympathy with the beautiful sufferer: we could but feel, that the gratification of our curiosity was at the expense of its life. The colors soon became less and less brilliant, and in five minutes entirely disappeared. A large shoal of the boneto were sporting round the ship in company with the dolphin; they are a very active fish, and frequently threw themselves several feet into the air.

In a waterspout, we have also had one of the phenomena characteristic of the region in which we now are. It was at too great a distance to be seen very minutely. The end nearest the ocean was scarce perceptible, though the agitation of the water under it was very evident; the upper extremity terminated by a tubular expansion — similar in form to the large end of a trumpet — in a heavy black cloud. The part clearly visible was about 300 feet in length, and the cloud not less than 1500 feet in height. There was a shower of rain, almost immediately afterwards, of the largest drops I ever saw. It is perfectly calm, and the ocean glassy as a mirror, which made the appearance of the rain, as it struck the surface of the water, singularly beautiful: as far as the eye could reach the whole sea seemed a plain of glass, studded with diamonds of the first magnitude.

Ten o'clock at night. The exhibitions of the day have been followed to-night by a phosphoretic scene of unrivaled splendor and sublimity. We had often before observed luminous points, like sparks of fire, floating here and there in the furrow of our vessel; but now the whole ocean was literally bespangled with them. Notwithstanding the smoothness of the surface, there is a considerable swell of the sea; and sparkling as it did on every part as with fire, the mighty heavings of its bosom were indescribably magnificent. It seemed as if the sky had fallen to a level with the ship, and all its stars, in tenfold numbers and brilliancy, were rolling about with the undulation of the billows.

The horizon, in every direction, presented a line of uninterrupted light, while the wide space intervening was one extent of apparent fire. The sides of our vessel appeared kindling to a blaze, and, as her bows occasionally dashed against a wave, the flash of the concussion gleamed half way up the rigging, and illumined every object along the whole length of the ship. By throwing any article overboard, a display of light and colors took place, surpassing in brilliancy and beauty the finest exhibition of fireworks. A charming effect was produced by a line coiled to some length, and then cast into the water at a distance; and also by a bucket of water dashed from the side of the vessel.

The rudder too, by its motions, created splendid coruscations at the stern, and a flood of light, by which our track was marked far behind us. The smaller fish were distinctly traceable, by running lines shewing their rapid course; while, now and then, broad gleamings, extending many yards in every direction, made known the movement of some monster of the deep. But minuteness will only weary, without conveying any adequate impression of the scene: it would have been wise, perhaps, only to have said that it was among the most sublime nature herself ever presents.

The cause of this phenomenon was long a subject of speculation among men of science, but is now satisfactorily ascertained to be sea-animalculæ of the luminous tribe, particularly the species medusa. The medusa pellucens of Sir Joseph Banks, and the medusa scintillans of Mr. Macartney, emit the most splendid light. The degree and brilliancy of the exhibition are supposed to depend on the state of the atmosphere and sea. A more grand display than that which we have witnessed, probably seldom, if ever, takes place.

CHAPTER III.

VOYAGE.

Monday, Jan. 6. Several days ago we took a fine breeze from the south, which has proved to be the regular trade-wind. The "swamp" was much less formidable than we expected. We have had but little rain, only a short calm, and no thunder-storm, though "the artillery of the heavens" has been heard, almost constantly, at a distance. We crossed the equator, yesterday morning, in longitude 24 deg. west. The heat, though great, has not yet been very oppressive: the mercury, in Fahrenheit, in the shade, has ranged from 79 to 83 deg., and in the sun stands at 116 deg.

Thursday, 9. S. lat. 8 deg. 34 min., W. lon. 27 deg. Early to-day, a sail was discovered with signals for speaking ; and we bore down to her. It was a Portuguese vessel, of very indifferent appearance. Our captain put the Thames so close alongside of her, that an apple could have been thrown on her deck. The commander could not speak English, and hailed through one of his crew. He merely wished to know our longitude ; and informed us he was bound to the western coast of Africa. With the knowledge of her destination, the horrors of a slave ship at once rose on the mind ; and the probability of her errand to that land of wretchedness, took entire possession of the imagination. The sighing of the captive, and the groaning of the oppressed, seemed already to be heard from her hatchways ; and, as we dropped into her wake, gazing at her black hulk and bloody waist — colors well suited to her character — I could not add, to the farewell wave of the hand, the customary ejaculation, “God speed thee !”

Never before do I recollect to have been so deeply impressed with the enormity of this trade. I involuntarily shrunk from the sight of men who I believed to be engaged in its cruelties ; and felt no inclination, as on similar occasions, to watch the lessening sail till it should sink beneath the horizon. Instead of impressions of beauty, before received from the same object, every look brought with it associations of human misery. Oh ! what perversion of feeling, what destitution of principle, must there be in the heart that can, in the light of the present day, convert the ignorance and debasement of those who, though sunk below the level of their race, are still “bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh,” into reasons for subjecting them to still greater degradation ! Surely, if anything on earth calls loudly for the righteous judgment of God, it is the prosecution of this trade ; and sooner or later, the retributions of a just avenger must fall on those who thus make the heavens echo with the moanings of the bereaved, and the earth rich with the tears and blood of the enslaved.

Jan. 22. S. lat. 33 deg, W. long. 51 deg. For some time past, the ocean around us has been enlivened by immense numbers of flying-fish — exocætus volitans. This is a beautiful animal, six or eight inches in length, and of slender and delicate form. Until now, I had an impression that it received its name from springing in the air for a moment only, and then sinking into its native element; but within the last fortnight, flocks of forty or fifty, and even a greater number, have risen about our ship, and flown yards before descending again. When in this situation, a person ignorant of their nature could not distinguish them from birds of the same size. The large transparent fins, which they use in flying, have every appearance of wings; and when in a direction opposite to the sun, their whole bodies are of a most dazzling silver white.

But in this case, as in that of the dying dolphin, we have been led to commiserate as well as to admire. At most times, when these little creatures thus take flight, it is only to escape from some devouring enemy in close pursuit. We have often caught a glimpse of a boneto darting through the water under them, as they have skimmed along its surface; and once, after watching with delight the lengthened course of an uncommonly beautiful fish, as time after time it dipped for a moment, but scarcely touched the waves before it rose again, and seemed to exert every power to pursue its rapid way, we saw it fall directly into the jaws of some ferocious monster, which, as if doubly ravenous from the chase, leaped partly out of the water to receive it.

They seem peculiarly ill-fated; not unfrequently, a flight from the enemies in their proper element, exposes them to the rapacity of others equally destructive; and they become the prey of gulls, cormorants, and other sea-fowl hovering over the water for food. In their ærial course, they often also come in contact with vessels, and fall helpless captives on the deck.

Since taking the south-east trade-wind, we have had most charming weather. The beauty, both of sea and sky, has been such as to attract constant observation; and the perfect clearness of the atmosphere, except a rich bed of clouds floating on the most distant horizon, is peculiarly pleasant, after the gloomy heavens of the "thunder-storm latitudes." We are all in fine health and spirits, and truly happy. Everything, within and without, indicates prosperity and peace ; and, occupied with a variety of useful employments, we have yet known nothing of the ennui so often complained of at sea.

We are not without evidence of a more interesting and important kind, that the blessing of God is upon us. A very visible change has taken place in the general deportment of our crew, and a great increase of seriousness is observable at the seasons of worship. Beneficial consequences are following our bible classes. While they enlighten the mind on the subject important above all others, they give an access to the heart and conscience, which could not otherwise be readily secured ; and the happy influence of which is already manifest. Another exercise, connected with evening prayers, the repetition by each of the missionaries of a single text of scripture, indiscriminately chosen from the bible, has been attended by a salutary effect. The practice was adopted from the inconvenience of reading at night on the quarter-deck, and has been found more successful in arresting the attention than the ordinary manner of introducing the scriptures at such services. There is something peculiarly impressive and solemn in the sound of so many different voices successively proclaiming, amid the darkness that covers the deep, the words of eternal truth.

Our Sabbaths also have, of late, increased in interest. There is now, generally, during the Sabbath an order and quietness in every part of the ship, becoming the character of the day. The officers and crew, like ourselves, are occupied with their bibles and other appropriate books ; and in meeting the various duties of this happy institution, we often experience the truth of the assurance, " they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength."

Our evenings, too, are greatly conducive to a spirit of devotion : the vast expanse of water around us, almost insensibly leads the mind to the eternity of which it is so often made an illustration. The mild splendor of a tropic sky, here adorned by the cross — " the emblem of redeeming love " — and the serenity of everything within observation, seem better suited to emotions of seriousness than the glare of day ; while the general silence of the ship, broken by leaves the mind to the free use of every contemplative power. It is a time in which I delight; and often, after most of our company are wrapt in sleep, I ascend the rigging, till even the footsteps of "the patrolling watch" are lost in the dashing of the water, there to gaze on the heavens, "the work of the Almighty, and the moon and stars which he hath made;" and, in view of their magnitude and sublimity, with the psalmist, to exclaim, "What is man, that THOU art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him?"

Thursday, 23. S. lat. 34 deg. W. lon. 51 deg. 30 min. Spoke the Hebe, of Philadelphia, from Buenos Ayres, bound to Rio Janeiro and Lisbon. The Thames was running under a press of sail before a strong breeze, against which she stemmed her way, close hauled, with double-reefed topsails only. She was but two days from port; and having been newly painted, looked as fresh and fair as the fabulous being whose name she bears.

Evening. The most tremendous squall we have yet encountered has just swept by. H—— and myself were taking our usual evening promenade on deck, when our attention was suddenly attracted by a singular appearance of the sky; and we had scarce directed an inquiring look to the captain, before the gust came raging upon us. The officers had time only to exclaim, "All hands on deck! hand the royals—and the top-gallant-sails too!—clew up the mainsail! mind your helm—quick! quick!"—while all became vociferation and confusion among the crew—when the wind struck us a full broadside, and instantly laid the ship almost on her beam-ends. Everything cracked, in her struggle against the blast, and she shot forward like a race-horse, with her gunwales in the water, and the sea on her lee towering yard-arm high.

All the furniture in the cabin was completely capsized, and those below, thinking the vessel going down, rushed on deck with looks and exclamations of horror. For some time, I thought every successive moment would see us engulfed in the flood, which literally yawned to receive us. But all the halliards having been let go, and the helm seized by an experienced hand, the ship was got before the wind, and somewhat eased, till the violence of the gust gave place to torrents of rain, accompanied by lightning and thunder. The foundering of a ship must indeed be horrible. I was not greatly agitated myself; the most unpleasant sensations I experienced, arose from the terror of others; for there were many a pale face and trembling lip among both crew and passengers. Whatever the degree of danger may have been, the scene was of a character deeply to fix upon the mind thoughts of that event by which, sooner or later, we shall all be made to stand before the bar of God.

Jan. 25. S. lat. 37 deg. W. long. 52 deg. 48 min. At twelve o'clock last night, a gale commenced, and in an hour's time we were compelled to lay-to, under a storm-stay-sail only. The howling of the tempest, plunging of the vessel, and trampling and hallooing of the sailors, effectually prevented our taking any rest. The first person from the deck, this morning, reported the wind to be a hurricane, and the waves mountain high: which we were ready to believe, without ocular demonstration. One or two only of the passengers attempted to take breakfast. While at the table, a sea struck the ship along her whole length, from the quarter-deck to the bows, and threw her nearly on her beam-ends. She lay trembling under the stroke, till I thought she would never rise again; and the water came pouring by the hogshead down the companion-way and through the steerage hatch. Everything was swept from the table, though secured in the manner usual in such weather; and some of the family, mattresses and all, were thrown from their berths into the cabin. On deck, one of the boats was stove, and the ship, in its whole length, was washed by the wave.

The gale continuing to increase, and the sea to rise at a fearful rate, it became necessary for our safety, to have the upper yards and masts sent down. The seamen were obliged to mount to their very tops, a distance of seventy or eighty feet from the deck, to unloose the rigging; where, they were swung, every successive minute, with incredible velocity, through a space of little less than ninety feet;

“Upon the high and giddy mast,
In cradle of the rude, imperious surge,”

while an inevitable grave yawned beneath them, should the slender yard, to which they clung, give way, or they once lose their footing. The unnatural sound of their voices, as their screams to make themselves heard below were caught by the wind and borne away on the tempest, came to the ear like the shrieks of the dying; and I dared scarce look up for a moment, lest I should see some one, in despite of every effort, thrown into the raging sea, where no power of man could have brought him rescue. Anticipating the expression of hopeless horror, which the wretch thus perishing must give, I often involuntarily closed my eyes, in the fear of beholding the agonizing reality.

The storm raged till evening with unabated violence, and produced greater anxiety than any we had before experienced. A tempest, such as this has been, is indeed indescribably sublime; but too dreadfully terrific, when at its height, to allow of much enjoyment. When it begins evidently to abate, and hope tells you that the worst is known, you are left to the indulgence of unmingled and enthusiastic admiration; and may gaze with delight at the ever-varying scene, as wave after wave rears its monstrous head, and "casts its foaming honors to the clouds." But, till this change does take place—while every successive blast blows harder and harder, and each billow threatens, more surely than its precursor, to bury you under its weight—it is impossible. Thoughts of fear must check, if they do not take entire place, of the higher feelings of admiration.

But though the day has been one of gloom, it has been marked by a circumstance, which has given me more genuine satisfaction than anything since we left America. In the dusk of the evening, while leaning, alone, against the railing of the quarter-deck, feeling in my own mind something of the desolation of the scene around me, my arm was gently touched by some one on the spars behind: it was R——, one of the hardiest of our crew. As my eye fell upon him, I at once anticipated his errand; and can scarce describe my emotion, when I ascertained it, indeed, to be the jailer's query—"What must I do to be saved?" Perceiving me alone, he had stolen from his station forward, to say that his spirit, like the troubled sea, could find no rest; and to beg to be directed in the way everlasting. His words were few, but his look, while he trembled under his guilt as a sinner, and earnestly supplicated an interest in my prayers, spoke volumes. So unexpected, though greatly desired and prayed for, was this event, that I almost doubted its reality. This state of feeling had been induced by a private conversation, on the subject of religion, immediately after the recitation of the bible class, on the preceding Sabbath; and he had scarcely eaten or slept during the whole week. Everything in his appearance manifested sincerity and contrition. I would not be too sanguine, yet cannot but hope that the Spirit of God has begun in his heart that good work which shall be performed "until the day of Jesus Christ." "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" and, should but one of this crew be truly converted to the faith and practice of pure religion, through the example, the persuasion, and the prayers of that individual, all his companions, ere the voyage is completed, may be turned to the Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

Notwithstanding this incident, our spiritual state, as a little band far separated from all the world, may be best understood from the lines of a favorite hymn:

"At anchor laid, remote from home, Toiling, we cry, 'Sweet Spirit come!'"

Thursday, 30. The latitudes in which we are now sailing, are by mariners called "the variable," in contradistinction to those which have the regularity of the trade-winds. You would think them well named, had you, with us, experienced the succession of gales, strong breezes, and calms, through which we have passed during the last week. The changes have been so sudden and so extreme, as deeply to impress on my mind the propriety and force of illustrations of the uncertain scenes of life by images from the sea. Any one familiar with its various states, knows it to be, indeed, "smooth and deceitful," yet "troubled and tempestuous" above all objects in nature.

After a calm which presented the whole ocean as a bed of glass, we have now again so much motion, that I am necessarily seated a la Turc, with my whole writing establishment in my lap. It is quite chilly — a November afternoon; and with the mercury in Fahrenheit at 52 degrees, our cloaks and caps are once more in requisition. On deck, the flying clouds, with dashes of rain, and cold blustering intervals of sunshine, remind me of a day late in autumn at Otsego, when the fresh wintry blasts first come howling down the lake.

Friday, 31. This morning, during a calm, we had the first full view of a whale. From daybreak till eight o'clock, many had been spouting at a distance; but this rose immediately at the bows of our vessel. The noise made by the suction of the water round the animal, and by its spouting, rendered the usual exclamation, "There she blows!" unnecessary, in attracting our attention to the spot; and we all hastened forward to catch a sight of so welcome a visitor. We were fully gratified; for it continued to play on the surface of the water, within a stone's throw, for more than an hour; and at one time lay alongside of us for some minutes perfectly still, and within a few yards of the ship. It was about eighty feet long, and proportionably large: its spout, appearing like pure and beautiful steam, was projected, by a single puff, nearly twenty feet into the air. The animal was of a species called fin-back — Balæna Physalus — a kind too fleet and powerful often to be attacked by whalers. It disappeared by diving head-foremost, and casting its broad flukes perpendicularly out of the water.

Monday, Feb. 3. S. lat. 45 deg. 30 min. We are now on the Brazil banks; had soundings at sixty fathoms on Saturday afternoon. The difference of depth in the water is plainly visible to the eye; the color having changed from deep blue to that of a beautiful light green. At four o'clock yesterday morning, we fell in with the whaler Britannia, of London, cruising on the banks, and sent letters on board of her, to be transferred to the first ship she should meet bound to America. Some of our number improved the opportunity to distribute tracts, which were gratefully received by her crew.

Thursday, Feb. 5. S. lat. 51 deg. All hands have been actively engaged to-day, in putting the vessel in trim for Cape Horn. The upper yards, masts, and rigging, have been sent down; and the ship dressed in a complete suit of new sails, of the stoutest texture. These preparations look formidable, but seem justified by the general aspect of the weather. Just before night there was a very peculiar exhibition on sea and sky. For half an hour before and after sunset, the whole heavens, except a quarter of a circle, in the west, which was perfectly clear, were covered by dense and unusually lowering clouds. The elevation of the unshaded arch was not more than five degrees; and under it, on the farthest horizon, a mass or line of vapor extended, so greatly resembling a distant coast, that had we not known it to be impossible, not all the power of vision, aided by our sea glasses, could have satisfied us that it was not the American continent.

The rays of the sun, entirely shut out by the heavy canopy above, came to us only in splendid reflections from this fairy realm, and presented a succession of mountains, and groves, and spires, and turrets, and towers, and even steamboats and lighthouses, all in the richest coloring, and glittering with silver. For some minutes, the splendor of the sight momentarily increased, drawing from us enthusiastic admiration: when the sun suddenly bursts from behind its dark drapery, and in an instant the whole mass of clouds, over and around us, were changed, in all their ponderous forms, from the blackness of night to the brightest crimson; while the sea, before shrouded as in a funeral pall, gleamed with the mingled reflections of purple and gold. The transition seemed one of enchantment; but our admiration was not unaccompanied by emotions of awe. The lowness and thickness of the clouds made the reflections of their color so strong, that the sun, though perfectly unobscured, glared with a fiery and unnatural light; which, as it gradually faded into the sickly shades of an eclipse, marked the sails and rigging, and every countenance with a hue of death. Minds that soar above the power of superstition, might have felt a momentary apprehension from such unusual omens; and while sea-birds, which delight only in the drivings of the storm, screamed around our masts above, or silently gazed at us as they tossed on the waters below, I could but exclaim —

“Dark gath’ring clouds, involve the threat’ning skies;
The sea heaves, conscious of th’ impending gloom—

Loud hollow murmurs, from the deep arise —
They come — the spirits of the tempest come !”

Feb. 7. Our apprehensions of heavy weather have not been realized ; and we are making most rapid progress, with clear sky and fair wind. We have been amused to-day by vast numbers of whales sporting near us on every side, and often thrusting their broad backs entirely above water, as they rushed past with the velocity of race horses. These also were fin-backs.

Saturday, Feb. 8. We were roused this morning, at six o'clock, by the cry, “Land ho !” Staten Land, seventy miles distant, being in sight. Points of Terra del Fuego were also seen during the forenoon. At mid-day we arrived directly opposite Staten Land ; and passed New Year harbor, at a distance of ten miles. The mountains are lofty and broken, and fantastic in their contour. Many of their summits were spotted with white, but whether of snow or rock we could not determine. The whole island appeared thickly covered with brush-wood, of low growth ; though one of our seamen, who has visited it for seal, says the trees, to the water's edge, afford good timber. The whole coast is iron-bound and precipitous, consisting of cliffs towering many hundred feet, against whose slippery bases the surf constantly breaks fifteen and twenty feet high. Everything wears an aspect of profound solitude, not a living creature being seen but the sea-fowl wheeling round their inaccessible nests, or diving to the waters below.

Knowing the island to be uninhabited, we were surprised, on a nearer approach, to see a column of smoke rising at the entrance of New Year Harbor. It was probably from the fires of persons left by ships, for the purpose of catching seal. While accounting for it in this manner, I could but wonder at the inconsistency of those who condemn the missionary to a heathen land as an enthusiast and a madman, and yet look on such as these, who, for a little worldly gain, banish themselves for months and years to the most lonely and inhospitable climes, as praiseworthy examples of enterprise and hardihood.

After passing the most eastern point of the island, and directing our course along its southern shore, it assumed new and interesting forms ; and its entire outline became more and more outré. Were I to send you a sketch of it, you would almost believe me sporting with your credulity. The whole seemed but a range of obelisks, pyramids, domes, castles, and towers, which even a dull imagination might have transformed into the gigantic works of the fabled race, said to have inhabited the southern regions of the neighboring continent. As the evening approached, the whole became empurpled by the rich tints of the "sunset scene," so often the subject of the artist's skill, while many points of rocks, from the water's edge to the highest peaks, either from ice or water or metallic composition, glittered with the brilliancy of diamonds. It is cheering, after having been seventy-nine days at sea, thus to have our horizon once more broken ; especially as it is accompanied by the assurance that we have very nearly reached the grand climacteric of our voyage — CAPE HORN.

CHAPTER IV.

VOYAGE.

Thursday, Feb. 20. S. lat. 57 deg. 30 min., W. long. 70 deg. 30 min. Immediately after finishing the preceding page, nearly a fortnight ago, we were assailed by the fierce winds of the Cape. We had just fallen asleep, after an uncommonly mild evening, when the rushing of an impetuous storm, followed by the alarming cry, "All hands on deck !" — thundered with stentorian voice, down the main-deck and forecastle hatchways — effectually roused us from our slumbers. It was more than an hour before the ship could be snugly hove to : and we have been in one uninterrupted gale ever since, making but little headway in our passage. Some apprehension existed, at one time, of our being too much in the neighborhood of the Diego Ramirez, a cluster of rocks thirty miles south of Hermit's Island, on which Cape Horn is situated. But we shortly afterwards ascertained ourselves to be well to the westward of them ; and, on the morning of the 16th, at four o'clock, made Cape Noir, an island near Cape Gloucester, on Terra del Fuego, twenty miles distant. We wore ship immediately, and had only time to clear the coast, before the wind, blowing "dead on shore," increased to a perfect hurricane, and for the last forty-eight hours has driven us with irresistible fury far eastward again. Here we still struggle with the elements.

H—— often says, "With what terror would our friends witness our situation !" At the very extremity of the globe, surrounded by an immense waste of angry waters, whose surface is unceasingly swept by wind and hail and rain and snow, our only earthly hope a few hundred feet of timber, which the ingenuity of man has formed to float on the ocean ; liable to many accidents, and hourly exposed to a frightful death, it would not be surprising if the bursting of the tempest above and the roaring of the deep below, should sometimes make us "fearful and unbelieving." But they do not. We have an unshaken confidence that all will be well ; and behold the terrors of our way without other emotions than those of gratitude and hope. We often view our good ship with a kind of sympathy : dismantled of much of her loftiness, and reefed and furled almost to bare poles, she looks, in her conflict, desolate as a solitary oak, writhing, in the contentions of a winter's storm.

Saturday, March 1. S. lat. 52 deg. W. long. 82 deg. After a tempestuous passage of 21 days, by the aid of a few hours fair wind, we find ourselves completely round Cape Horn. The whole ship's company, passengers and crew, appear like captives just liberated from a gloomy and uncomfortable prison. You will not be surprised at this, when informed that we have scarce seen the sun for three weeks, and the moon but once, though she is now some days past her full. Not one of the officers or crew have had dry clothes during the whole of the time ; the deck has been constantly deluged, and the cabin dark and cold ; for we have had no fire, though the mercury has stood as low as 34 degrees and 36 degrees. Our nights have been restless, from the violent motion of the vessel and the groaning of her timbers ; and our days spent in stupidity and idleness, if an involuntary loss of time deserves to be called by that name. We could do nothing but wrap ourselves in our cloaks, hold on to anything within reach, and, whether sitting up or lying down, roll and pitch with our laboring bark.

Notwithstanding these facts, this part of our voyage has by no means been uncommonly tedious or uncomfortable. The prevailing winds of this region are heavy gales from the west, the direct course to be steered in passing the Cape, and ships are often detained by them three times the period we have been, and meet weather far more dangerous and severe; so much so, that many vessels, after striving in vain for weeks here to make a passage into the Pacific, have been obliged at last to bear away for the Cape of Good Hope, and make their voyage across the Indian ocean.

There is great cause for gratitude, that we have thus passed this dreaded goal, and are permitted to pursue our way without disaster or longer detention. Our crew have all been kept in life, where many a poor sailor has found a cold unfathomed grave; and our ship has rode in safety where not a few have met an untold fate.

March 4. S. lat. 48 deg., W. long. 84 deg. If the affections of my heart are ever roused to an enthusiasm of joy, it is when I see a young man in the fullness of his health and strength, turning from folly and sin to the love of God. Such a sight I have lately had the happiness to witness in G——. I have had long and repeated opportunities of conversing with him on the salvation of the soul; and for some time past he has been deeply serious. More than once I have seen him stretched at full length in his state-room, apparently under the influence of thoughts and feelings bordering on agony. The same emotions have been visible in his countenance and manner, as he has walked his nightly watch on deck; and he now stands, before the whole ship's company, as one who is confessedly of a broken and contrite spirit in the sight of his Maker and his Judge. I cannot but believe that in him we have the faithfulness of the promise, that the Spirit should be sent "to convince of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment."

My interviews with R——, since the gale off the Rio de la Plata, have been frequent. He continues greatly interested for his own salvation. On two nights, recently, I have spent a part of his watch on deck with him, and at both times, by the light of a waning moon, have seen tears roll in torrents down his hardy cheeks, while he has spoken of the things that relate to his eternal peace.

To some of his shipmates he has become an object of ridicule, while others seem to be like-minded with himself. Shortly after passing Staten Land, he came to me one morning, with a very animated look, saying, "O Mr. S——, I have much hope of C——; he is greatly troubled, has knocked off swearing, and is constantly overhauling his bible. He used always to swear when reefing in a gale; but on Saturday night, we were on the lee-yard-arm of the main-topsail together for half an hour, and, though it blew a hurricane, and we could do nothing with the sail, he never swore a word. Let him only cut cable, and swing from the fellows in his watch, and I shall not fear for him!"

I do not wonder that the angels of Heaven, who know all the bliss of true holiness, rejoice before the throne of God, at the repentance of a sinner on earth. When I look on these rough sons of the ocean, and know that the breath so lately spent only in profaneness and sin, is now addressed to God in prayer; and that from some secluded part of the ship, they daily and nightly offer the sacrifices of penitence—sinful as they have been, I at times feel ready to clasp them to my bosom, as those who shall yet be purified, even as Christ is pure. Oh! that their number may here be increased, till every soul, by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, shall "be made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light."

March 6. G—— is rejoicing in the possession of a Christian's hope. He requested an interview with me last night, during his first watch; and as I approached him in the dark, fell on my neck, with emotions that denied him utterance. It was sometime before he could tell me of the new affections that had taken possession of his bosom. So great and so entire a change had taken place in his views and feelings as to constrain him to believe that unto him "old things had passed away, and all things become new," and that he was "in Christ Jesus a new creature." After an interesting and exciting conversation, I left him as I found him, rejoicing in the fullness of hope; and praying in my own heart, that the affection throbbing within his manly breast, might prove to be the commencement of a joy, which in the world to come, shall "rise immeasurably high."

A short time since, R—— was in great despondency, and said to me, "I know not what to do! I have read my bible, and have prayed; I have tried for weeks and for months to be religious, but I cannot; I have no true repentance, no real faith, and God will not hear my prayers; what can I do? I feel that my soul will live forever; and without the grace of God, I know it must eternally perish." But to-night I met him with his bible in his hand, and his very heart in his face, when his first words were, "O, Mr. S—, I have found the right way to believe; it was the righteousness of Jesus Christ I needed. Now the whole bible is not against me, as it used to be, but every word is for me; because I see and feel how God can be just, and yet justify an ungodly sinner."

Monday, March 10. This evening, while walking the deck, I happened to cast my eyes into the steerage, and could not refrain from wishing that some of those whose hearts are interested for the salvation of seamen, and who are active in their exertions to promote it, could have stood by me for a moment. One person only was there, and for the time I wished to see no other: it was C—— reading his bible. The lamp was suspended from the upper deck, at too great a height to admit of reading by it when seated on the floor; and too much fatigued by a hard day's work to stand, he was kneeling, and reading with an attention and solemnity that seemed to absorb every thought and feeling. He did not change his position in the least, till the bell rang for prayer, a full half hour from the time I first observed him, while his attitude, countenance, and whole appearance, gave strong testimony that he was searching the Scriptures for "the words of eternal life."

their friend G——; and there is a seriousness from the quarter-deck to the fore-castle that forces itself on the observation of every one. Even M——, who seemed to be so far given up to evil as to have no one to care for his soul, is filled with wretchedness as a sinner. And while conversing with him, I have seen “rivers of waters” fall from his cheeks into the briny deep, as he has hid his face on the gunwale of the ship. And what, my dear M——, shall we say to these things? Whose is the power that has produced such impressions on the feelings of these hardy sailors? And what influence, but the breathings of the Holy Spirit, could thus have melted their hearts into penitence?

March 12. At two o'clock, P. M. descried a sail; and soon afterwards recognized the red banner of Britain. She proved to be the brig Tiber, from Valparaiso, bound to Valdivia, eight days out. Captain Clasby asked, before coming up with her, whether any one of us wished to board her; but we all declined,—which I greatly regretted, when, after passing, and being nearly beyond hearing, her commander, in his farewell words, reported the “U. S. ship Franklin, 74, Commodore Stewart, at Valparaiso.” I would have been delighted, in obtaining more particular information from our friends of that ship.

Monday, March 24. S. lat. 15 deg. W. long. 96 deg. In the midst of more important thoughts, I have omitted to mention that we have entirely left the region of winds and tempest, and long ceased to ride upon “the mountain wave.” We are now ploughing a widely-extended plain, under a press of sail, at the rate of ten miles an hour; and instead of the chilling blasts of the Cape, are fanned by a breeze balmy as the breath of May. When we first sent our top-gallant sails and royals up, and again spread our broad studding-sails to the wind, we almost feared, after seeing the ship so long staggering and reeling to and fro like a drunken man, under close-reefed topsails only, that she could not bear so great an addition of height and breadth; but she hastens on, with all her accustomed stateliness and beauty; and with so much steadiness, that we are scarce sensible of the slightest motion. The contrast in our whole situation is so great, as to produce a proportionate exhilaration of spirits; and with a sailor's life, in its most favorable aspect, before me, I have been led with Byron to exclaim —

“Oh who can tell, save he whose heart hath tried,
And danced in triumph, o'er the water wide,
The exulting sense, the pulse's mad'ning play,
That thrills the wand'rer of the trackless way,
O'er the glad waters of the dark blue sea !”

For some time after entering the Pacific, we almost doubted the appropriateness of its name: the experience of the last three weeks, however, has fully satisfied us on this point; but for the deep blue of the surface, we might fancy ourselves to be sailing on the placid bosom of a lake. We are now off the coast of Peru; and have been greatly delighted with the beauty of the sky and clouds, which is here very peculiar, and I should think scarce rivaled in any other part of the world. Towards evening, and early in the morning, I have seen, at the same time, clouds of almost every color, in different parts of the heavens; and of hues I seldom beheld there before — for instance, a rich and perfect green, amber, and carmine — while the hemisphere round the rising or setting sun has been one blaze of glory. Last night, the tinge on the ocean added greatly to the effect of the scene; it was of perfect blood color, occasioned by the reflection of a fleecy veil of crimson clouds, stretched over a greater part of the heavens; the appearance was so extremely singular, as to cause us almost to shrink from it, as from something supernatural.

Monday, March 31. I never knew a Sabbath on land such as yesterday was here. Even the sky was of a purity not often noticed before; and the eye, in its vision, seemed capable of reaching the very limits of space. Not a cloud was visible; the white bosom of a tropic bird here and there was only to be seen, appearing, in her lofty soarings, like a flake of snow against the blueness of the heavens. About the ship, scarce a sound was heard from the opening of the morning till the close of day, but the rippling of the water as we sailed through the deep, or the voice of worship as we bowed before our God. All on board appeared to feel, as well as know, that the day was sacred to its Maker; and when I viewed the neatness and order of everything, and witnessed the quiet and solemnity that prevailed, I could almost fancy that I saw "HOLINESS TO THE LORD" inscribed on the clouds of canvass spread to the breeze. Our public services were delightful; and what Christian would not have felt them to be so, when the bright tear of rapture might be seen starting in the eyes of some, and that of sorrow trembling in those of others; both of whom, till of late, "cared for none of these things."

R—— is one of the happiest of creatures. All he says is worth twice its real value, from the manner in which it is communicated. He, last night, related to me a conversation he had with C—— a few days since. C—— came to him, with a spirit greatly troubled, and wished to know in what manner he had obtained the light and liberty he appeared to enjoy, adding, "I believe the bible to be true, and every word of it to be from God. I know that I can be saved only by redemption of Jesus Christ. I feel my misery as a sinner, I believe everything, but how am I to believe so as to be saved? I want faith, and how am I to get it?" R—— told him it was just so with himself once: "I did not know what faith was, or how to obtain it; but I know now what it is, and believe I possess it. But I do not know that I can tell you what it is, or how to get it. I can tell you what it is not: it is not knocking off swearing, and drinking, and such like; and it is not reading the bible, nor praying, nor being good; it is none of these; for, even if they would answer for the time to come, there is the old score still, and how are you to get clear of that? It is not anything you have done or can do; it is only believing, and trusting to what Christ has done; it is forsaking your sins, and looking for their pardon and the salvation of your soul, because he died and shed his blood for sin; and it is nothing else." A doctor of divinity might have given poor C—— a more technical and polished answer, but not one more simple or, probably, satisfactory.

Tuesday, April 8. N. lat. 3 deg., W. long. 115 deg.
We have bidden adieu to the southern hemisphere, most probably forever. We recrossed the equator on the night of Saturday, 5th instant — three months, to an hour, after having passed it in the Atlantic.

The last evening was devoted to the observance of the monthly meeting for prayer, a service not expected to recur again till we shall have left the Thames. It was an exceedingly interesting hour. While the burden of our petitions, in unison with the appointment, was, "Thy kingdom come!" the objects, and the end, of the missionary cause rose with all their moral sublimity on our view and caused us to sing with delighted animation the fine hymn,

"Glorious things of thee are spoken,
Zion, city of our God!"

A set of verses composed by Kristnu, the first Hindoo convert at Serampore, also formed a part of the exercises, and while we chanted its simple stanzas, we could not but hope that similar knowledge and piety might yet characterize the productions of some who, through our instrumentality, should be turned, like him, from "darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God."

Every association connected with the peculiar services of this day, consecrated as it is by those who look for the salvation of the world, must produce a happy influence on the heart believing that "the fervent effectual prayer of the righteous man availeth much;" especially on that of the missionary, who, however unknown, however solitary and destitute, still feels that he is included among the scattered bands for whose special blessing the followers of Christ, unitedly, thus

"Bend the knee and lift the hand in prayer."

We were joined in this worship by all the officers and crew off duty, some of whom, we trust, have found access by the same spirit to our common Father and God. It was with no ordinary feelings of gratitude that we beheld so many of these rough but interesting men uniting with us, not only by an external attendance, but, as we believe, with the warm affections of the heart. Often during the evening I saw tears of joy glistening in the bright eyes of R—, and could readily imagine the language of his soul to be, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; if I prefer not thee to my chief joy."

Friday, April 11. N. lat. 8 deg. 30 min. W. lon. 134

deg. This date has been marked, my dear M——, by an incident which will invest it, to those most nearly allied to us, with a deeper interest than any other I have yet recorded: the birth of a son to our dear H——. The captain determined that the young stranger should be by birth, as fully as possible, an American, and master C—— first saw the light under the proud wavings of our national banner.

April 15. About the period of the last date we entered the north-east trade winds, and ever since have been rushing onward before their freshness at the rate of more than two hundred miles a day. Should we continue to be thus prospered, we shall in a very short time make the land of our long expectation.

Thursday, April 24. It is even so — the island of Hawaii is before us. For two or three days past we have had many indications of being in the vicinity of land. Several times, yesterday, we imagined we could trace the outlines of a mountainous coast, but were as often deceived by the heaping of clouds only on the horizon. During most of this morning we were subject to the same illusions. The fixedness, however, of clouds and mist directly before us seemed to indicate the attraction of high land; and, at three o'clock this afternoon, as this thickness began to rise from the face of the ocean, the broad base of Hawaii, shrouded in Egyptian darkness, came peering through the gloom. The reality was too certain to admit of a question, and was accompanied by sensations never known before.

In my own heart, with the joy there was a mingling of pain: the signal was given, as it were, for separation from those in whom I had become deeply interested, and many of whom are in a state the issue of which may be deeply connected with destinies of eternity. The first tumult of feeling was quickly succeeded by something that insensibly led to solemnity and silence. Several of the crew were seen to brush an unbidden tear from their eyes; and from one, as he turned away after a first gaze and hastened below, I overheard the exclamation, "Land indeed it is — and the last and saddest sight I wish to see!"

As the evening approached, the overshadowing mist and vapor slowly rose higher and higher, disclosing first the cultivated lands along the shore, some fifteen or twenty miles distant, and then woodland regions above, with here and there a projecting cascade. As the scene increased in interest and beauty, the language of our hearts was, "Hail and welcome!" And, after tea, becoming grouped along the gunwale of the ship next the land, we almost insensibly joined in singing the appropriate hymn,

"O'er the gloomy hills of darkness,
Look, my soul, be still, and gaze."

We had scarce finished the first line, before we were encircled by officers and crew, with a seriousness that bespoke a participation in the sentiments on which we were dwelling. Some of their bosoms throbbed, I doubt not, with affections known only to the pious mind. The last rays of a glorious sun were gleaming from the west, and a full-orbed moon rising upon us in the east; before which, the haziness on the land suddenly gave way, without leaving a trace of the gloom which an hour before had overshadowed the whole island, except a light drapery of clouds on the highest point of the mountains. The change was too sudden and too remarkable not to be noticed; and we could not but hope and pray, that the greater spiritual gloom which we knew filled the land, might as speedily flee away before the mild light of the Gospel of Salvation.

CHAPTER V.

ARRIVAL AT HAWAII.

Friday, April 25. The appearance of Hawaii, this morning, was exceedingly beautiful. We were within a few miles of the shore; and the whole of the eastern and northern parts of the island were distinctly in view, with an atmosphere perfectly clear, and a sky glowing with the freshness and splendor of sunrise. When I first went on deck, the grey of the morning still lingered on the lowlands, imparting to them a grave and sombre shade, while the region behind, rising into broader light, presented its precipices and forests in all their boldness and verdure. Over the still loftier heights, one broad mantle of purple was thrown; above which, the icy cliffs of MOUNA-KEA, at an elevation of some 16,000 feet, blazed like fire, from the strong reflection of the sun-beams, striking them long before they reached us on the waters below. As the morning advanced, plantations, villages, and scattered huts, were distinctly seen along the shore; and columns of white smoke began to rise here and there from the early fires of the inhabitants.

At nine o'clock, the breeze being light, a boat was sent off from the Thames for refreshments. Not long afterwards the deck of our ship echoed with the cry, "A canoe — a canoe!" and one of the rude barks of the natives was seen rapidly approaching us. Every eye was instantly fixed on it with intense observation; and I hastened to assist H — from her state-room to the cabin windows, to view the uncultivated beings with whom we are to spend our lives. A first sight of these degraded creatures was almost overwhelming: their naked figures, wild expression of countenance, their black hair streaming in the wind as they hurried the canoe over the water with all the eager action and muscular power of savages, their rapid and unintelligible exclamations, and whole exhibition of uncivilized nature, gave to them the appearance of being half-man and half-beast, and irresistibly pressed on the thoughts the query — "Can they be men — can they be women? — do they not form a link in creation, connecting man with the brute?" This indeed seemed to be the general impression; and the officer heading the boat sent to the shore, on his return, exclaimed as he ascended the deck, "Well! if I never before saw brutes in the shape of men, I have seen them this morning!" and addressing himself to some of our company, added, "You can never live among such a people as this, we shall be obliged to take you back with us!"

Other canoes soon arrived, and many gathered round us to gratify their curiosity, and dispose of fish, water-melons, bananas, sugar-cane, and sweet potatoes. They remained an hour or two, and notwithstanding our first impressions, greatly commended themselves to us by their artlessness and simplicity, and an apparent sprightliness and intelligence of mind. They seemed rejoiced to know that more missionaries had arrived, and on hearing it, addressed one another with great animation, exclaiming, "Mikanele — maikai, maikai — nui, nui maikai." "Missionary — good, good — very, very good." They informed us that the missionaries at the islands were all well, and were with the king and chiefs at Oahu.

At twelve o'clock we entered the channel between Maui and Hawaii, and ran close along the north shore of this last island. Everything here exhibited great poverty. The mountains were covered with clouds, and not a tree or shrub was to be seen. The whole surface of the country was spread with dark rocks; and the little grass perceptible was scorched and sun-burnt. The huts seen scattered along the beach, looked more like the sties and kennels of pigs and dogs, than the abodes of men: and the whole appeared something like the Hawaii I had pictured to my mind's eye, when I first seriously thought of devoting myself to the missionary work in these islands. Yet the sight made me almost draw back from a home so barren and so miserable.

In the evening, Hawaii and Mouna-kea again at a distance afforded another of the sublimest of prospects, while the setting sun and rising moon combined in producing the finest effects on sea or land. The mountains were once more unclouded, and with a glass we could clearly discern immense bodies of ice and snow on their summits.

Saturday, April 26. We sailed rapidly during most of the night, and had the prospect of reaching Oahu early this morning; but a fine wind left us and we are now slowly advancing along the western sides of Maui, Lanai and Molokai, with the promontories of Oahu still far before us. All the islands in sight have a mountainous and rocky appearance, not very interesting at a distance, except from the wild and romantic outlines which distinguish some of their number.

Hawaii rises on every side from its broad base in gradual and unbroken ascent, till, like a patriarch, it overlooks the whole cluster to which it gives name. The only irregularity in its outline is occasioned by three wide-spreading pyramids or cones, forming the summits of the same number of mountains : Mounakea on the east, Mounaloa on the south, and Mouna-Hualalai on the west. The height of Mounakea is estimated at 16,000 feet, that of Mounaloa at 14,000, and that of Hualalai at 10,000 feet above the level of the ocean.

The eastern peninsula of Maui forms one unbroken mass, rising 10,000 feet high : but the western end is divided into separate mountains ; and though not so lofty as the eastern promontory, is thus in its outline much more romantic and beautiful. We have particularly admired three lofty peaks near this extremity of the island, which the natives on board say are immediately behind Lahaina, one of the most fertile and beautiful districts in the group, and the proposed site of a new missionary station.

Kahulawe is a mass of uninteresting and barren rock, at an elevation of a few hundred feet only, above the sea. Lanai is five or six thousand feet high, and so regular in its contour that it might be described by a segment of a circle ; while Molokai, immediately north of it, like the west end of Maui, is broken into lofty peaks and spurs of mountain, jutting boldly into the sea, and imparting to the island an appearance of great wildness and sublimity.

At anchor, off the harbor of Honolulu, Monday, April 28. At twelve o'clock on Saturday night, by the light of a full moon, we made the south-east end of Oahu, five miles distant. Nothing can surpass the wild beauty of the promontories forming the headlands of this part of the island ; and I was detained on deck for several hours, gazing at them with delight, as the ship lay off and on, waiting the approach of day.

At sunrise, we were close under Diamond hill, a principal point on the south side of the island. It is the crater of an extinguished volcano, the bare shell of a decapitated mountain, whose bowels have been exhausted by fire. It is of a circular form, many miles in circumference ; and rises almost perpendicularly several hundred feet. Its sides everywhere look like seared walls ; and are fluted and furrowed from top to bottom by the washings of water-courses, as if by artificial workmanship. They are also surmounted in many places by a kind of moulding, of equally singular formation ; and again by blocks and piles of jagged lava, having in their elevation the appearance of the parapets and battlements of a dilapidated castle. A more unique object of the kind can scarce be imagined.

Immediately on rounding this point, the whole of the south side of Oahu burst on the eye in beautiful panoramic view ; presenting, first the bay of Waikiki, encircled by heavy groves of the cocoanut and other luxuriant trees, then an extensive and perfectly level plain, stretching four or five miles along the shore and a mile or two inland. A variety of hills skirt the sides of this rising, first in gentle undulations, and then more abruptly, till they run off in lofty and pointed ridges to a range of mountains dividing the island in the direction of the coast, and crowning its centre with two or three elevated peaks. Some of these hills near the plain are covered only with a smooth greensward, gleaming in the brightness of the morning with all the softness and richness of velvet ; others are sprinkled here and there with single trees and clumps of various-colored foliage, from the darkest green to that which seems almost white ; and all, as they rise to the mountains, become clothed with a rich woodland verdure.

At the farther end of this plain, three or four miles distant, lay the town of Honolulu : to which a fort with its floating banner, the American consulate, the mission house, and a cluster of masts in the harbor, gave something of an aspect of civilization. Directly inland from the town, at the foot of the mountains, another old crater was distinguished, planted with a battery of guns, from which also the flag of the nation was waving. Beyond Honolulu to the west, lay a wide extent of open country, apparently under good cultivation ; and terminated, at a distance of ten or fifteen miles, by a noble chain of mountains, the middle of which is marked by a fine stretch of table land.

At eight o'clock we cast anchor in the open roads, within a mile of the shore and town ; and I took a moment for more minute observation : There was much of natural beauty before us. All was in a glow of brightness ; but there was a want of life and elasticity that forced itself at once on the notice : a stillness — not the stillness of the Sabbath, though it was the day of God — but the stillness of a torrid clime, whose enervating and depressing temperature was plainly to be seen in the strong vibrations of a heated air. While I gazed on the thickly crowded huts of the natives, seeming so many sunburnt ricks of hay, and saw with a glass their naked inhabitants, lounging about in listless inactivity, I felt that I had reached a strange land — a land far different from that in which were the habitations of my fathers, and where till now had been my home.

At nine o'clock, Mr. Bishop, Mr. Richards, and myself, with the natives William Kamahoula and Richard Kalaioula, accompanied the captain on shore. We rowed half a mile along the coral reef by which the coast is here bound, and on which the surf breaks some hundred rods from the beach, before coming to the narrow opening forming the channel into the harbor. The entrance is short; and we were soon in the midst of ten or fifteen ships, principally American and English whalemens, and some five or six of the native vessels, brigs and schooners, all anchored near to the beach, and some at moorings on the shore.

The bay is small, not more than half a mile long and a quarter broad, but deep and perfectly safe. Its western side is lined by marshes and fish ponds, stretching northward till they meet a small river at the head of the harbor, by which the congregated waters from the mountains are poured into the sea. The town of Honolulu lies on a point, formed by the eastern side of this river and the curvature of the beach as it sweeps again towards the ocean, and presents to the view, first the establishment of Mr. Marini, a Spanish settler, consisting of a stone dwelling stuccoed and whitewashed, with other buildings of similar construction, enclosed by a wall of coral and mud; then the residence of the American consul, a wooden house two stories high with covered verandahs and venetian blinds; several mud store-houses; a small building of wood belonging to the chiefs, and the fort of mud, covering an acre or two of ground, furnished at an elevation of ten or twelve feet with embrasures, and surmounted by small guns. Immediately behind these, thickly crowded and irregularly built huts of mud and grass, the habitations of a population of five thousand natives, are seen in a straggling grove of cocoanut trees ; and beyond, the beautiful and richly cultivated vallies of the interior enclosed by mountains of great height and wildness.

Perceiving a low stone quay on a point under the fort, and near a cluster of native buildings, we were about to land on it, when a party of islanders exclaimed, "kabu ! kabu !" and informed our interpreters, William and Richard, that the largest of the houses was the residence of the king ; and he had prohibited any one from landing at that place. William replied, "New missionaries have arrived," when they ran to the palace ; and a fine looking young female, in a European dress of pink satin, with a wreath of yellow feathers on her head, made her appearance. It was Kameha-malu, the favorite queen of Liholiho. She expressed her regret that the quay was kabu ; and politely requested us to row to a spot on the beach nearer the town, to which she pointed, and where she would meet us.

By this time she was joined by a gentleman whom we afterwards found to be Mr. Jones, the American consul ; and taking his arm, they proceeded together to the place appointed. On landing, we were introduced to her Hawaiian majesty by this gentleman. She received us very cordially ; and after bidding us welcome to the islands, consigned us to the care of Mr. Jones, and returned to the point. The queen appears about twenty or twenty-two years of age ; and though well formed, is tall and masculine in figure. Her countenance is open and intelligent, with fine black eyes and hair ; but her features are too broad and flat for beauty ; and her complexion that of a dark mulatto, the general color of the islanders.

The news of our arrival soon reached our missionary friends ; and after waiting a few minutes at the consulate, we had the happiness of receiving the warm salutations of Mr. Loomis, and the Rev. Mr. Ellis, an English missionary, under the patronage of the London Missionary Society. Mr. Ellis has been many years at the Society islands, and is but recently established at this group. His experience in missionary labor, and his acquaintance with

Thronged by a crowd of chattering and noisy natives, who expressed their pleasure at our arrival, by hooting and dancing, and running along our path, we proceeded immediately with these gentlemen to the mission-houses, situated on the plain, half a mile from the village : here we were introduced to the rest of the family, consisting of the Rev. Mr. Thurston and Mrs. Thurston, Mrs. Bingham, Mrs. Ellis, and Mrs. Loomis. Mr. Bingham was absent at Waikiki, three miles distant, attending religious service with a large party of chiefs, at a temporary residence at that place.

At eleven o'clock, Mr. Thurston preached in English at the mission chapel, to an audience of about one hundred foreigners — sixty of whom were captains, officers, and seamen, from the ships in port. The hour could not be otherwise than deeply interesting to us : the chapel in which we worshipped was the first ever erected on the ruins of idolatry in this land ; and though of the simplest and rudest construction, being entirely in the native style, it was on this account beautiful and lovely in our eyes.

We had completed a long voyage, and were permitted to tread the shores of our destination under circumstances of peculiar mercy ; and now had the privilege of paying our vows of gratitude to God from one of his peaceful temples, though in the humblest form. I can never forget the excitement with which I entered its lowly roof, trod the matted ground, its only floor, and looked at its unbarked posts and rafters, and coarse thatch of grass : primitive as everything appeared, I felt that it was a house of God, and one of the happy gates of Heaven.

On returning to the mission house, we had the pleasure of meeting the Rev. Mr. Bingham. The report of our arrival had reached Waikiki, and one of the queens of Liholiho had been sent with him as a messenger from the chiefs there, to request a visit from us at their afternoon worship ; and after dinner, we accordingly proceeded to that place.

The queen, in a dress of white cambric, rode in a light wagon, drawn by a troop of natives, who hurried it along with great rapidity; and was followed by a train of attendants, one with a spit-box, another with an umbrella, some with fans of cocoanut leaf, &c. &c. Among the rest, one bore two feathered staffs, six or eight feet in length, with handles of ivory and tortoise-shell; these were carried as badges of rank. We ourselves made the excursion on foot; first over the large open plain to the east, which is entirely without trees or cultivation; and then through successive groves of the cocoanut and plantations of the banana. We found the chiefs encamped in slight bamboo bowers, under a grove of cocoanuts by the seaside, and near the bay of Waikiki.

The party consisted of Keopuolani, the queen dowager, and mother of the present king; the prince Kawikeaouli, her son, a lad nine or ten years of age; the princess Nahienaena, his sister, two years younger; Kaahumanu, the favorite queen of Kamehameha, and her present husband, Kaumualii, king of Kauai and Nihau; his son Kealiihonomi; and Kalaimoku, or Mr. Pitt, as he is usually called, prime minister both to the former and present king, with two or three hundred of their favorite attendants and followers. The chiefs were all under one lanai, or rude bower, the floor being spread with several thicknesses of mats, on which some were seated, a la turc; others lounging, and some lying down, with their heads resting on round pillows of silk velvet, damask, and morocco. Behind, or near each one, a servant sat or kneeled, fanning his master or mistress with a fan made of the leaves of the cocoanut, and holding in the other a small round bowl of dark polished wood, filled with the leaves of an aromatic vine for a spittoon. Another servant sat or stood near each chief with a kahile or feathered staff, which he constantly waved, to keep off the flies. They were all dressed in European costume, and each had a small spelling-book and slate on his mat with him. They greeted us with much kindness of expression and manner; and seemed interested in the improvements they are making, and in the religious services of the day. They wrote their own names on their slates, for us to read, and secure the right pronunciation; and requested us to leave ours with them, for the same purpose. They repeatedly shook hands with us, reiterating their joy at our arrival, saying, they were glad too, that we had come on the la kabu, the Sabbath-day; appearing to view this circumstance as a propitious omen.

The servants, and rest of the common people, were all in the native dress. That of the men consists of a malo or girdle, eight inches or a foot in width, and nine or ten feet long, twisted round the loins; and a kihei or mantle, usually about six feet square. This article is worn by tying two corners of the same side together, and then passing the head and one of the arms through the opening thus made: leaving one arm and shoulder bare, with the knot resting on the top of the other, and the folds of the kihei hanging down to the knee, both before and behind. The drapery thus formed, is graceful, and not unlike the toga of the Romans. The female dress consists of a pau, a roll of cloth, several yards in length, and one in width, worn in the manner of a petticoat, by wrapping it round the figure from the hips to the knee; and of a kihei also, usually of a larger size than that of the men, and worn as a long shawl, over both shoulders, or over one only. The full costume of malo, or pau, and kihei, forms a becoming, and, in some degree, modest dress; but the kihei is seldom used, except in the cool of the mornings and the evenings; and as generally seen, without it, the exposure in both sexes is disgusting.

At sunset we returned to the ship, much gratified with our trip on shore. We again passed the palace without seeing Liholiho: and I am sorry to state the reason,—he was intoxicated, in which condition he has been four or five days, since an annual feast in commemoration of the death of his father, and of his own accession to the throne.

Harbor of Honolulu, Tuesday, April 29. The Thames was towed into the harbor this morning at sunrise, by twenty well-manned whaleboats; and was brought to anchor opposite the establishment of the king, within a stone's throw of the fort. Our companions disembarked almost immediately, and took possession of native houses, prepared for them in the missionary enclosure. It is thought most prudent for H——, to defer removing to a grass hut as long as possible, and captain Clasby having kindly insisted on our retaining our accommodations with him, we shall remain on board the Thames till she is ready to proceed on her voyage to the coast of Japan.

It was signified early after our entrance into the harbor to-day, that some of our number would be expected by the king to wait upon him soon at his residence. Four or five of the gentlemen, including myself, therefore landed immediately; and were introduced to his majesty and most of his court. Liholiho was much indisposed, being just on the recovery from his late debauch. He was stretched on a couch of silk velvet, and naked, except a strip of chintz thrown loosely round his waist. Several servants were fanning him, and one of his queens giving him a cup of tea. He looked exceedingly stupid; and so much the worse for his excess, as to be a brutish object, as he tossed his arms and legs about in all the restlessness of a fit of nausea. He was too ill to do more than signify his pleasure at our arrival; and to request the whole company to call upon him and the rest of the chiefs, on their way from the ship to the mission house.

Accordingly, at eleven o'clock, we all went on shore for the purpose of a formal presentation to the government. The palace stands on a stone quay, within a few feet of the water. It is a large and fine house for one of the kind; perhaps fifty feet long, thirty broad, eight feet high at the sides, and thirty at the peak of the roof. The exterior is entirely composed of a thatch of grass; and in its whole appearance is strikingly like the Dutch barns seen in many parts of our country. There are two large doors, one at each end, and several windows without glass, but furnished with Venetian shutters, on each side of the house. This is the only native building in which I have observed windows. The interior, making one apartment only, is neat, well finished, and elegant for the Sandwich islands. All the timbers, the side posts, a row of pillars supporting the ridge-pole through the whole length of the house, and the rafters, are straight and substantial, and all beautifully hewn. The cinet or braid formed from the shreds of the husk of the cocoanut, by which the whole are fastened together, exhibits both skill and taste in its manufacture and arrangement. The furniture is rich, consisting, besides handsome mats with which the ground is everywhere covered, of three or four large chandeliers of cut glass suspended between the pillars running through the centre of the building, of mahogany dining and pier tables, crimson Chinese sofas and chairs, several large pier glasses and mirrors, some tolerable engravings, principally of naval engagements and battles in Europe, likenesses of distinguished persons, &c., and two full-length paintings of Liholiho, taken by an artist attached to the Russian squadron of discovery under the command of commodore Vaseclieff, which not long ago visited this group.

The king was much in the same state as when I saw him after breakfast. Most of the other chiefs, all the principal personages of the kingdom, including the party from Waikiki, having assembled, made a highly respectable appearance; especially the favorite queen Kamehamalu. She was seated on a sofa, at the middle of a long table covered with a superb cloth, having a writing-desk open before her, and a native secretary at each end of the table, recording the names and taxes of the inhabitants of a district who were paying tribute. These were entering in single file; and, passing along the table on the side opposite the queen, they deposited their dollars before her, and left the house at another door. Every twenty or thirty of them were preceded and followed by a couple of the king's body-guard, armed with muskets and in a kind of uniform. The only dress of Kamehamalu was a loose pink slip. She left her writing-desk on the entrance of the missionaries, but immediately after receiving them, resumed her seat, excusing herself from farther attentions on account of the public business in which she was engaged. Her manners are dignified and graceful; and her whole appearance that of a well-bred woman, having an unaffected expression of conscious and acknowledged rank. She is a woman of business, and appeared well versed in that before her. She has ordered a roll-book to be opened, in which the names, residence and tax of all the nation are to be registered, and it is the superintendence of this that so much occupied her attention.

Kaahumanu is one of the most powerful of the female chiefs, and attracted particular observation. She joined the company after our arrival, and entered the house with much of real majesty in her step and manner. She was dressed in the native female costume. The paru or under garment consisted of about twenty yards of rich yellow satin, arranged in loose and graceful folds, with a full end hanging negligently in front; the upper robe was of purple satin, in as profuse a quantity. It was cast over one arm and shoulder only, leaving the other exposed, and flowed in its richness far on the ground behind her. Her hair was neatly put up with combs, and ornamented by a double coronet of the exquisite feathers so often mentioned in accounts of these islands; colors bright yellow, crimson and bluish green. She appears to be between forty and fifty years of age, is large and portly, still bears marks of the beauty for which she has been celebrated, but has an expression of greater sternness and hauteur than any other islander I have yet seen.

The young princess Nahienaena came, seated on the left shoulder of a stout man, her feet resting on his arms, folded for this purpose across his chest, and having her right arm round his head and forehead. This is the way in which she is usually carried; and is always followed by a train of twenty or thirty boys and girls, principally of her own age. Her dress, like most of the others, was in the European fashion; and of black satin trimmed with broad gold-lace, with black satin hat and feathers. She is a pretty and well-behaved child, not as an Indian, but according to our own ideas of the characteristics of childhood. The prince was also present in a round coat and pantaloons, of black silk velvet. They have both learned to read and write, and are among the most attentive and docile pupils of the mission.

My mind had been strongly prepossessed in favor of Kaumualii, king of Kauai, before I left America. The sending of his son George to the United States to be educated at the early period he did, spoke well for his intelligence and foresight. The deeply affecting interview, described in the journal of the missionaries, which took place between them on the return of the son, after a protracted absence of fifteen years, and when the father had long thought him dead; the warm reception given by Kaumualii to the missionaries themselves; the active part he took in the establishment of two of them in his own island; and the liberality, uniform kindness, and patronage extended to them afterwards,—had exceedingly interested me. A knowledge of later events connected with his history, has excited a still deeper interest for this distinguished chieftain.

Kaumualii, though an acknowledged tributary prince to Kamehameha, virtually remained the undisturbed sovereign of Kauai and Nihau, paying only a yearly tax, of his own levying, to the supreme king. Liholiho, on the death of Kamehameha, felt some uneasiness lest Kaumualii should throw off his allegiance; and the apprehension was still farther excited by the receipt of a letter from George Tamoree, shortly after his return from America, addressed to him as "king of the windward islands": a limitation of title by no means pleasing to his majesty, the sovereign of the group. With characteristic promptness and enterprise, he immediately determined to visit the "leeward part of his dominions;" and made the voyage to Kauai under the following circumstances of singular boldness and intrepidity.

Proposing an excursion to Pearl river, a favorite fishing-place on Oahu, twelve or fifteen miles west of Honolulu, he sat off with a party of high chiefs in an open sail-boat, for this destination. On reaching the mouth of the river, however, finding the wind fair for Kauai, or its supposed situation—he had never visited or seen the island—he refused to land, and avowed the determination to bear away for the leeward group.

Against this the chiefs all strongly remonstrated, urging as decisive objections, the width of the channel, near a hundred miles, its roughness in a fresh wind, the danger of attempting the voyage in an open and crowded boat, without provisions or water, the uncertainty of being able to fetch an island entirely beyond sight, and the smallness of their number in case Kaumualii should prove hostile. But fearless himself, equally of the elements and the prince, contrary to all their wishes and expostulations, he bade the helmsman put the frail bark before the wind; and spreading one of his hands, with the fingers widely extended upon the gunwale, laughingly said, "There is your compass — head her by this point !" touching the finger he believed to be in a line with the destined course !

Almost immediately, the boat was twice nearly capsized and filled by the breaking seas ; and with one voice the chiefs exclaimed, "We must go back !" — but firm to his purpose, the king replied, "No ! bail out the water and sail on ; if you return with the boat, I will jump overboard and swim to Kauai !" They therefore reluctantly obeyed, and began with their calabashes to free the boat from water, a labor they were required constantly to renew, as they were hurried to the midst of the channel. Fortunately, just before night, they descried the island far to the leeward of them, and veering their course, before daybreak next morning, made a successful but hazardous landing.

The spirit manifested by Kaumualii on the occasion, was entirely amicable. As soon as apprised of the arrival of Liholiho, he went forth to meet him with cordial salutations of friendship, resigned his best houses for his accommodation, and immediately despatched a brig and schooner to the seat of government, at Oahu, to make known the safety of the king, and the place where the residue of his suite and household might join him.

At an early period the two kings, surrounded by their respective chieftains, were found engaged in the important topic of the sovereignty of Kauai and its dependencies : a point which, for the time, led to an exhibition of Roman magnanimity on the part of both.

The moment the subject was introduced, Kaumualii, with evident emotion, turned to Liholiho, and said, — "King Liholiho, hear ! — while your father, Kamehameha, lived, I acknowledged him to be my king. He is now dead : you are his rightful successor, and you are my king ! I have abundance of muskets and ammunition, and many subjects at my command ; these, with the vessels I have bought, with my fort and its guns, and with my islands, are yours. All are yours. Do with them as you please ; and make what chief you choose governor here !" a deep silence followed this full surrender of power, and all awaited with solicitude the reply of the young monarch. In a few moments, with a kind and generous smile, he said,

"Kaumualii, I have not come to take from you your island. I wish not to place any one over it : keep it yourself ; take care of it as you have done ; and do with your vessels and all your possessions as you please !" a shout of joyful approbation from all parties followed ; and Kaumualii retired from the circle with a smile of contentment and peace.

It seems, however, that there was a want of sincerity on the part of Liholiho, in this apparently ingenuous contest of princely disinterestedness ; or at least circumstances afterwards induced him to change his views of the subject. For, after being entertained for several weeks by Kaumualii with great kindness and hospitality,* Liholiho invited him, on the arrival, from Oahu, of his favorite brig, the Haakoe o Hawaii, or Pride of Hawaii — the splendid Cleopatra's Barge, formerly of Salem, Massachusetts — to go on board of her for an hour or two one morning ; and as soon as they were well seated in the cabin, secretly gave orders to have the anchor taken, and to bear away for Oahu, thus making a captive of his royal guest ! A principal chief in the party of Liholiho was left behind, to take the government of Kauai ; and Kaumualii, thus treacherously torn from his island and queen Kapuli, to whom he was warmly attached, was compelled by the government, on his arrival at Oahu, in order to throw a veil over the real motives for this procedure, to marry the imperious dowager Kaahumanu. In her chains, and I am told they are far from being silken bonds, he is still securely held.

He has a fine figure, though not so large as most of his fellow chiefs, with a noble Roman face, a style of feature very uncommon among the islanders, and when he could feel and exclaim, "I am monarch of all I survey !" must have looked indeed like a king. But now the expression of his countenance and his whole manner indicate a pensive and dispirited mind ; he feels himself to be a prisoner of state, and, though still called king of Kauai, knows that he will never again enjoy the government of his favorite island.

The dress of kings will be as interesting to you as that of queens and princesses ; and since Liholiho appeared en savage, I will mention that of Kaumualii. It consisted of a black silk velvet coat and pantaloons, buff kerseymere waistcoat, white silk stockings, splendid gold watch, with seals and rich ornaments, &c. &c.

* See a well written and interesting journal, by Rev. Mr. Bingham, in the August number of the Missionary Herald, for 1822.

Kalaimoku, or Mr. Pitt, the prime minister, is another individual extensively known to the civilized world. He is a man of very superior powers, and of great political sagacity. From his youth he has held a pre-eminent rank in the nation, both as a counsellor and a warrior. He, too, is a fine looking man, apparently between fifty and sixty years of age ; and was dressed in a suit of lead-colored silk camlet, with white Marseilles waistcoat and white stockings.

He has been notorious for his dissipation, especially for intemperance in drinking ; and when intoxicated he was often guilty of the most wanton outrages of various character. Happily, through the instruction and persuasion of the missionaries, he has of late entirely abandoned this habit : it is now many months since he was known to be in a state of inebriation. He avows his belief in Jehovah as the only true God ; and uses all his influence, as an officer of the government, in favor of the external observances of Christianity. By his personal example, also, he supports the missionaries in their efforts to secure the moral reformatations they are anxious to achieve.

He is fond of jesting, and at times is very playful in his conversation. Not long since, accompanied by one of his most intimate friends, he took tea with Mr. Ellis. After partaking to their satisfaction of this beverage, they both turned their cups upside down, and placed the spoons across them. Mr. Ellis asked the reason for this. Kalaimoku answered, "It is so with the foreigners, when they wish no more ;" to which Mr. Ellis replied, "Perhaps with sailors in the fore-castle it is, but gentlemen merely leave the spoons in the empty cups." A few evenings after, the same two chiefs were at Mr. Ellis's tea-table again. When Kalaimoku had finished, he was careful to leave his spoon and cup in the manner Mr. Ellis had mentioned, as customary in good society ; but his more negligent friend, forgetting the previous conversation, arranged his as in the former instance; on which, Kalaimoku laughingly said to Mr. Ellis, "You see that fellow still belongs to the fore-castle, — he has turned his cup up again!"

There were many other high chiefs present: Boki, governor of Oahu, the brother of Pitt, and Liliha his wife; Naihe, the national orator, or hereditary speaker in the councils of the chiefs; Kaikioewa, the guardian of the young prince, with Kapiolani and Keaweamahi their wives; Hoapili, the husband of Keopuolani, and step-father of the king; Naihi Kukui, or captain Jack, as he is familiarly called, the commander of the native fleet; with many other inferior chiefs of both sexes.

We remained more than an hour, during which our public papers were presented, our commission from the Missionary Society, instructions, and certificates of American citizenship; each one of us then made some present of trifling value, such as a silver pencil-case, &c. &c. to different individuals in the group; and took our leave, satisfied with our reception, and the general kindness manifested towards us.

Friday, May 2. We have to-day been favored with a visit from his majesty. At one o'clock, Kehikili, a chief of rank, and a punahele or intimate companion of the king, came on board the Thames, to apprise us of the intended honor. About two hours afterwards, Liholiho, and Kinau one of his queens, a sister of Kameha-malu, and Kalaimoku, with a crowd of attendants, made their appearance on the stone quay. The boats of our ship were immediately lowered, and brought them on board under flying colors and a salute. I could scarce believe the king to be the same man whom, as the intoxicated Indian, I had seen with disgust three days before. He was perfectly sober, and in fine health and spirits. There is nothing particularly striking in his countenance, but his figure is noble, perhaps more so than that of any other chief; his manners polite and easy, and his whole deportment that of a gentleman. Both himself and minister were drest in full suits of handsome broadcloth of navy blue, well fitted, and fashionably made; with round beaver hats and Wellington boots. The party remained about two hours, and, after partaking of some refreshments, left the ship under another salute. We have also had a visit from Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Bingham, and Mrs. Loomis.

May 3. The king has very handsomely expressed his good will to the mission by refusing to take the customary harbor fees from the commander of the Thames. Captain Clasby has received the following letter from him on the subject :

E. CAPT. CLASBY.

Aloha oe. Eia kau wahi olelo ai oe. Maikai no oe i kou haavi ana mai i ka kumu hou. Aole oe e uku i ke ava — aole akahi.

Aloha ino oe.

LIHOLIHO IOLANI.

TO CAPTAIN CLASBY.

Love to you. This is my communication to you.
You have done well in bringing hither the new teachers.
You shall pay nothing on account of the harbor — no, nothing at all. Grateful affection to you.

LIHOLIHO IOLANI.

He remitted the harbor-fees in like manner on the arrival of Mr. Ellis from the Society Islands; making a sum of one hundred and sixty dollars, which, in the course of three months, he has generously relinquished from a regard to the mission. Iolani is a favorite name which he often attaches to his common signature.

Monday, 5. The Sabbath was distinguished by the reception of the reinforcement into the mission church; by the administration of the Lord's Supper; and by the baptism of our son. The hours for public worship with the natives are ten o'clock in the morning, and four o'clock in afternoon. Mr. Ellis preached in the native language in the morning to a crowded congregation, including the king and all the chiefs, from the text, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation!" At 11 o'clock, when the services mentioned above took place, Mr. Richards preached in English to a large congregation, from the words, "The God of Heaven, he will prosper us, therefore we his servants will arise and build." The chapel was thronged with the chiefs in rich dresses of silk, velvet, damask, satin, crape, &c., who seemed interested in the ceremonies, though scarce any of them understood a word of English. There were a large number of respectable looking foreigners also present — the whole audience making not less than four hundred — gathered to this humble temple by the sound of the "church going bell," which, until within the last three years,

"These valleys and rocks never heard."

Liholiho attended all the services of the day. He was still sober, and I can readily believe what is said of him to be true when so — that he is one of the most interesting characters in the nation. He looked remarkably well, and spent half an hour at the mission house before the worship in the chapel began. In a suit of dove-colored satin, with white satin waistcoat, silk stockings and pumps, he appeared both in dress and manners the perfect gentleman. I have been led to notice the dress of the chiefs more particularly than I might otherwise have done, from my surprise at finding such richness of material, such variety of changes in their wardrobes, and such taste in the selection and arrangement of colors; I doubt not it will be equally a surprise to our American friends.

Kameha-malu saw H—— and C——, for the first time yesterday; she claimed C—— as her own son immediately, and would let no one take him from her arms during the time she remained. She has been to see them on board the Thames already this morning, and amused herself and us by writing and reading both in English and in the Hawaiian tongue. She does not understand English, but has learned to pronounce and read it with tolerable accuracy. She is fond of study; puts her knowledge of writing to daily use, in sending notes and letters to the different missionaries and such of the chiefs as have learned to write; and is very assiduous in her efforts to make greater attainments than she has yet secured.

Mission house, Monday, May 12. Early this morning, the ship so long our happy home, cleared the harbor, and bore away upon the open sea. We watched the receding sail with sensations of deep feeling until she became a speck in the horizon, and for myself, I may say, until that speck wavered against the sky in the uncertainty of the distance, and was at last lost to my sight in the starting tear of a farewell benediction.

We ourselves disembarked on Saturday, and became the inmates of an Indian hut within the missionary enclosure. Our friends would probably think our situation worthy of deep commiseration could they see us as we are. Our house might easily be erected in the smallest room in yours, my dear M——, it being only fourteen feet long and twelve broad, three feet high at the eaves, and nine feet at the peak of the roof. It is composed of poles and a thatch of grass, in the native manner, having no floor, but the ground spread with mats; for windows three holes are cut through the thatch, without sash or glass; and a door, without bolt, lock, or bar. In this little cabin, H—— and myself, C—— and B——, with all our personal luggage, are stowed. The trunks and boxes containing the latter are rather a convenience, however, than an incumbrance; for with the exception of a bedstead and a cot, they constitute the whole of our furniture, and form our only tables and chairs, articles of which, in propria forma, we have neither. Still I can assure you, we are most truly contented, and feel ourselves even more comfortably accommodated than we could have anticipated on first landing in this heathen country; if light hearts and bright faces are signs of happiness, we are not without good proof that with us there is, at present, a fulness of that blessing.

Yesterday I preached my first sermon in these distant islands, to a large and attentive audience; among whom were most of the officers and crew of the Thames. Some of those, of whose serious impressions on our voyage we thought favorably, much to our sorrow have shewn, since our arrival in port, that "the root of the matter" was not in them. Their goodness, "as a morning cloud, and as the early dew," disappeared under the influence of temptation and the power of sin. Among the number, however, there is one only in whose moral integrity we had placed confidence. The rest, by their steadfastness in the midst of a licentiousness that can scarce have a parallel, and which is so universal in its influence as, almost without an exception, to sweep into its deadly vortex visitors of all ranks and of every age — have greatly rejoiced our hearts, and encouraged us with fresh confidence to commend them to the love of God and to the word of his grace, hoping that ever after, as now, they will be kept from the evil that is in the world, and eventually attain unto everlasting life.

Before Captain Clasby took his leave, the passengers of the Thames addressed a letter to him and to his officers, expressive of their gratitude for the unwearied kindness and attention received from them during the voyage — a mark of respect and good-will to which they were richly entitled.

May 14. It has been determined in a full meeting of the mission, that before occupying any new station an exploring expedition shall make a tour through the island of Hawaii, visiting every place of importance, and bringing a report to the mission at Oahu. The Rev. Mr. Ellis, Rev. Mr. Thurston, Rev. Mr. Bishop, Mr. Goodrich, and myself, form the deputation appointed for this purpose. We are to embark in the first vessel that sails for that island; and as that may be in a day or two, with the information of this appointment I will close the journal of my voyage to the islands.

CHAPTER VI.

TEMPORARY RESIDENCE AT HONOLULU.

Mission house at Honolulu, May 15. A scene was acting at the time of our arrival to which I would for a moment revert: an annual feast in commemoration of the death of Kamehameha, and of the accession of Liholiho to the throne. My notice of it, however, must be principally from the statements of others — it having commenced three days before the Thames reached Oahu, and though it continued for a fortnight, the only day afterwards distinguished for much parade was one of special religious observances at the mission house.

On the first day previous to our arrival, the king gave a very large dinner, well served in a lanai, or bower, where tables were laid for two hundred persons. The missionaries were invited; and Mr. and Mrs. Bingham, Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, and Mr. Loomis, attended. The foreign residents of respectability, and the officers of the numerous ships in port, were also of the party. All the natives present wore the European costume. Black had been given out as the court dress, and every article of that hue in the place, satin, silk, crape, velvet and cloth, was immediately bought. Those who were not fortunate enough to secure any of these, purchased pieces of black silk handkerchiefs and had them made into dresses.

Kamehamalu, in satin and lace, sustained the part of mistress of ceremonies. She personally saw that no one of the company was in any degree neglected, and extended her kindness even to those who had no claim to special civility. For instance, seeing a crowd of American sermen without the guard, who to the number of two hundred surrounded the bower, she immediately gave orders to have refreshments served to them.

While at table, a procession of four hundred natives, the inhabitants of eight districts of Oahu, passed before the party and deposited a tax, in kind, at the feet of the king. They were all dressed in white native cloth, and made a handsome appearance as they marched in single file; each district led by its headman, or overseer, carrying a large torch of the kukui, or oil nut; and all bearing before them various articles, the produce of their plantations, neatly wrapped up and tastefully ornamented with green leaves. This procession was the only thing in the entertainment not designed to be in imitation of foreign customs; such as the style of dress, manner of cooking and serving up the provisions, the discharge of canon, the music, &c.

The ceremonies of the last day were altogether Hamaiian in their character, and highly interesting as an exhibition of ancient customs, which it is probable will soon be lost forever in the light of civilization and Christianity, now rapidly dawning on the nation. The most intelligent and influential of the chiefs and people already speak of the "time of dark hearts," and I believe are sincerely desirous of abolishing every unprofitable practice which had its birth in the ignorance of former days. In this abolition, much connected with the late celebration will be included—a fact which gives a double interest to its scenes, and leads us to catch at them as at the relics of paganism. There is much reason to believe that a taste for these ceremonies among the chiefs will be so far lost, even before the lapse of another year, that they will never be repeated, and that the notes now taken of them will prove to be a record of the last striking features of heathen usages at the islands on such occasions.

Kamahamalu on this day was, as usual, a conspicuous object. The car of state, in which she joined the processions passing in different directions, consisted of an elegantly modeled whaleboat, fastened firmly to a platform or frame of light spars, thirty feet long by twelve wide; and borne on the heads and shoulders of seventy men. The boat was lined, and the whole platform covered, first with fine imported broadcloth, and then with beautiful patterns of tapa or native cloth, of a variety of figures and rich colors. The men supporting the whole were formed into a solid body, so that the outer rows only at the sides and ends were seen; and all forming these wore the splendid scarlet and yellow feather cloaks and helmets of which you have read accounts, and than which scarce anything can appear more superb.

The only dress of the queen was a scarlet silk paru, or native petticoat, and a coronet of feathers. She was seated in the middle of the boat, and screened from the sun by an immense Chinese umbrella of scarlet damask, richly ornamented with gilding, fringe, and tassels, and supported by a chief standing behind her in a scarlet malo or girdle, and feather helmet. On one quarter of the boat stood Kalaimoku, the prime minister, and on the other Naihe, the national orator—both also in malos of scarlet silk and helmets of feathers—and each bearing a kahile, or feathered staff of state, near thirty feet in height. The upper parts of these kahiles were of scarlet feathers, so ingeniously and so beautifully arranged on artificial branches attached to the staff as to form cylinders fifteen or eighteen inches in diameter and twelve or fourteen feet long; the lower parts or handles were covered with alternate rings of tortoise-shell and ivory, of the neatest workmanship and highest polish.

Imperfect as the image may be which my description will convey to your mind, of this pageant of royal device and exhibition, I think you will not altogether condemn the epithet I use, when I say it was splendid. So far as the feather mantles, helmets, coronets, and kahiles had an effect, I am not fearful of extravagance in the use of the epithet. I doubt whether there is a nation in Christendom, which, at the time letters and Christianity were introduced, could have presented a court dress and insignia of rank so magnificent as these: and they were found here in all their richness, when the islands were discovered by Cook. There is something approaching the sublime in the lofty noddings of the kahiles of state, as they tower far above the heads of the group whose distinction they proclaim — something conveying to the mind impressions of majesty unequalled by the gleamings of the most splendid banner I ever saw unfurled.

The queens Kinau and Kekauonohi presented themselves much in the same manner as Kamehamalu; but instead of whaleboats, had for their seats double canoes. Pauahi, another of the wives of Liholiho, after passing in procession with her retinue, alighted from the couch on which she had been borne, set fire to it and all its expensive trappings, and then threw into the flames the whole of her dress, except a single handkerchief to cast around her. In this she was immediately imitated by all her attendants: and many valuable articles, a large quantity of kapa, and entire pieces of broadcloth, were thus consumed. This feat of extravagance was induced, however, by a nobler motive than that which once led a more celebrated and more beautiful queen to signalize a festival by the drinking of pearls. It was to commemorate a narrow escape from death by fire, while an infant: a circumstance from which she derives her name — "Pau," all or consumed — and "ahi," fire. Her house was destroyed by an explosion of gunpowder, which became accidentally ignited. Five men were killed by it, and Pauahi herself was much burned.

The dresses of some of the queens-dowager were expensive, and immense in quantity. One wore seventy-two yards of kerseymere of double fold — one half being scarlet, and the other orange. It was wrapped round her figure, till her arms were supported horizontally by the bulk; and the remainder was formed into a train supported by attendants appointed for the purpose.

The young prince and princess wore the native dress, malo and pau, of scarlet silk. Their vehicle consisted of four field-bedsteads, of Chinese wood and workmanship, lashed together side by side, covered with handsome native cloth, and ornamented with canopies and drapery of yellow figured moreen. Two chiefs of rank bore their kahiles; and Hoapili and Kaikioewa, their step-father and guardian, in scarlet malos, followed them as servants, — the one bearing a calabash of raw fish and a calabash of poe, and the other a dish of baked dog, for the refreshment of the young favorites.

From the parts I myself saw, I can readily believe that the whole procession, from the richness and variety of dress and colors, wreaths of flowers, evergreens and feathers, cloaks, helmets, kahiles, and splendid umbrellas, must have formed an interesting spectacle, even to visitors from civilized and polished countries.

The king and his suite made but a sorry exhibition. They were nearly naked, mounted on horses without saddles, and so much intoxicated as scarce to be able to retain their seats as they scampered from place to place in all the disorder of a troop of bacchanalians. A body-guard, of fifty or sixty men in shabby uniform, attempted by a running march to keep near the person of their sovereign, while hundreds of ragged natives, filling the air with their hootings and shoutings, followed in the chase.

Companies of singing and dancing girls and men, consisting of many hundreds, met the processions in different places, encircling the highest chiefs, and shouting their praise in enthusiastic adulations. The dull and monotonous sounds of the native drum and calabash, the wild notes of their songs in the loud choruses and responses of the various parties, and the pulsations, on the ground, of the tread of thousands in the dance, reached us even at the missionary enclosure. But they fell on the heart with a saddening power; for we had been compelled already from our own observation, as well as from the communications of others, necessarily to associate with them exhibitions of unrivaled licentiousness, and abominations not to be told.

I can never forget the impressions made upon my mind, the first few nights after coming to anchor in the harbor, while these songs and dances were in preparation by rehearsal and practice. With the gathering darkness of every evening, thousands of the natives assembled in a grove of cocoanut trees near the ship; and the fires round which they danced, were scarce ever extinguished till the break of day, while shouts of revelry and licentiousness, shouts of which till then I had no conception, and which are heard only in a heathen land, unceasingly burst upon the ear.

The necessary and frequent recurrence in my writing, of the names of persons and places, and other words in the native tongue, leads me to anticipate the perplexity you may feel in the pronunciation of them. A remark or two on the principles of the language, and a few hints on its orthoepy, will enable you with facility rightly to pronounce any word or phrase that may be introduced.

The language, as you know, was exclusively oral till after the arrival of the American missionaries: a first effort by them, was a reduction of it to a written form. They found it to be simple in its elements, and capable of being represented in its sounds by a selection from the Roman alphabet. Its peculiarities consist in a predominance of vowels, an entire rejection of double consonants, and of all sibilant, nasal, and guttural sounds, and the invariable termination of every syllable and word by a vowel.

The Hawaiian alphabet consists of fourteen letters: five vowels, a, e, i, o, u, and nine consonants, b, d, h, k, l, m, n, p, and w. That no letter should be silent, and that every letter should have one undeviating sound, were made radical principles in the written language. The English sounds of the consonants were retained; but important advantages led to the adoption, for the vowels, of the sounds given to them in the principal languages of the continent of Europe. To pronounce any word in their tongue correctly, therefore, it is necessary only to learn the proper sounds of the vowels and diphthongs.

- a is sounded ah, as in man, mat, marry.
- e has the sound of a in fate, mate, date.
- i has the sound of ee in bee, or i in marine, machine.
- o is sounded as in no, note, mote.
- u has the sound of oo as rude, rule, and ruin.

The principal diphthongs, are

- ai, sounded as in aisle.
- au, sounded ow, as in vow.
- oi, sounded as in oil.
- ou, sounded like o followed closely by oo.

By way of illustration, I will add the correct orthography and orthoepy of the names of the islands, and places of the present, and contemplated missionary stations.

The name of the largest island is not Owwhyhee, as generally written since the time of Cook, but Hawaii. The O is satisfactorily ascertained to be the sign of a case only—that of the nominative in answer to the question who or what—and not a part of the proper name. The islanders say, No Hawaii, I Hawaii, Mai Hawaii, as well as O Hawaii, forming the regular declension of the noun Hawaii: thus—

Nom.	O Hawaii,	Hawaii.
Poss.	No Hawaii,	Of Hawaii.
Obj.	I and Mai Hawaii,	To and from Hawaii.

The language is radically the same as that spoken throughout Polynesia, at the Marquesas, the Society and Friendly islands, and at New Zealand. It is soft and harmonious in its sounds, and, so far as a knowledge of it has been acquired by the missionaries, is found to be more copious, forcible, and systematic in its construction, than had been expected.

May 18. Our constant intercourse with the king and chieftains, forming his court, will make an outline of the “peerage” of Hawaii desirable, if not indispensable, to a right understanding of the relative rank, situation, and offices of the different individuals we meet.

The whole body of chiefs may be divided into three classes, or grades of rank: the first, consisting of the royal family and those most intimately connected with it: the second, of those holding hereditary offices of power and the governors of the different islands; and the third, of the rulers of districts, the head men of villages, and all inferior chiefs. The individuals included in the first two grades are usually called “high chiefs ;” and those in the third, “small,” or “low.” The high chiefs are few in number, and closely allied both by blood and marriage: forming, in fact, but one family. Still, they are filled with the pride of birth, and, even the highest, tenaciously prefer the slightest grounds of precedence.

Rank, as a right, is hereditary as well in the female line as in the male: the dignity of the mother, as well as that of the father, fixing the grade of the child. The individual who, at the present time, takes rank above all others, is a female — Keopuolani, one of the wives of Kamehameha, and mother of Liholiho, who, both by father and mother, is the last lineal descendant of the ancient kings of Hawaii and Maui, and boasts the unmingled blood of royalty immemorial. She was taken captive by Kamehameha in his usurpation, and espoused by him from a motive of policy, that his children might have an hereditary right to the throne from their mother, as well as a right by conquest from himself.

The following scale will exhibit the number, grade, and respective offices of the generation of chiefs now living.

CHIEFS OF THE FIRST RANK.

KEOPUOLANI, queen-mother: wife of Kamehameha, and grand-daughter of Karaiope — the Terreoboo of Capt. Cook — king of Hawaii.

LIHOLIHO, or KAMEHAMEHA II., the king. } Children of Ke-

KAMEHAMALU. } Queens of Liholiho: the first three

KAAHUMANU. } Queens-dowager, wives of Kamehameha.
KALAKUA. } These are sisters, and grand-daughters of NAMAHAHA. } the last king of Maui.

KAUMUALI, ex-king of Kauai, and a husband at present of the queen-dowager, Kaahumanu.

KEALIAHONU, son of Kaumualii, and also a husband of the dowager Kaahumanu.

KAPULI, ex-queen of Kauai, and formerly wife of Kaumualii.

KALAIMOKU, or WILLIAM PITT, the prime minister, originally a chief of the third class only, but now ranking with the royal family, and virtually king.

LEALEAHOKU, only son of Kalaimoku.

CHIEFS OF THE SECOND RANK.

KAIKIOEWA, the guardian of the prince.

HOAPILI, guardian of the princess, and present husband of the queen-mother Keopuolani.

NAIHE, the hereditary counsellor of state and national orator.

KAPIOLANI, wife of Naihe.

[All these chiefs are the descendants of leading families under the ancient kings of Hawaii; and still hold large hereditary possessions in land, with great influence over the people.]

KUAKINI, or JOHN ADAMS, governor of Hawaii.

KEEAUMOKU, or COX, governor of Maui and its dependencies, Kahulawe, Lanai, and Molokai.

[These two chieftains are sons of a former prime minister of Hawaii, grand-sons of the last king of Maui, and brothers of the queens dowager, Kaahumanu, Kalakua, and Namahana. The name of Adams was given to Kuakini when a child, at the time the presidential chair of the United States was filled by our venerable countryman of Quincy. The governor considers the name a great honor, and prefers it, in being addressed, to any other.]

BOKI, governor of Oahu, and brother of Kalaimoku, the prime minister.

KUINI, or LILIHA, the wife of Boki.

MAIHINENUI, governor of Kauai and Nihau, and sister of the ex-king, Kaumualii.

WAHINEPIO, a sister of Karaimoku, and mother of the young queen, Kekauonohi — belongs to this grade, and also,

KAHALAIA, her son, by a brother of king Kamehameha.

CHIEFS OF THE THIRD RANK.

KAPIHE, or NAIHEKUKUI, commander of the king's vessels.
KEKUANAOA, superintendent of sandal wood, and king's treasurer.

HANAUMAIKAI, head man of Waikiki in Oahu; KEOUA, of Lahaina, and AUAE, of Wailuku in Maui; KAMAKAU, of Kaawaloa, and MAALO, of Hilo in Hawaii; &c. &c.

To this class belong several other chiefs, who are not in office, such as KAICO and KEHIKILI, brothers, descended from the kings of Maui, and the last the husband of Wahinepio, sister of Kalaimoku. Both are puna-hele, or bosom companions of the king; by which distinction ti, Kalaikoa, Hinai, Puaa, &c. &c., of this grade, are also known. To this grade, Laanui, an interesting young chief, husband of Namahana, one of the former wives of Kamehameha, also belongs; and many others, who are known only as small chiefs.

The chiefs of the last rank are the most numerous, but are as inferior in consequence to those of the two former, as an English esquire or baronet is to a royal duke, or noble earl, or marquis.

All the persons included in this catalogue have a variety of names, here, the substitute for a string of titles. I have used the most favorite, and those by which the respective individuals are commonly addressed. The chiefs frequently change their names, or assume new ones from passing circumstances. For instance, Paa-lua, "twice blind," is now a name of Kalai-moku, often used by himself and others, and perhaps that to which he is most partial. It was assumed in the following manner: When Kamehameha died, the prime minister expressed his loss in the death of his friend, by saying that he had lost an eye — paa-kahi — blind in one eye, or once blind; and chose that word for a name. Within the last year a favorite wife, the daughter of Kaiki-oewa, died; when he proclaimed himself paa-lua, blind in both eyes, or twice blind, and he is now known throughout the nation by the name of Paa-lua.

All names of persons are significant. Keopuolaini is literally, "The gathering of the heavens, or of the clouds of heaven." Kameha-meha, "The lonely one." Kamehamalu, a name assumed by the queen after the death of her father, "The shade of the lonely one." Kaahu-manu, "The feather mantle." Kalakua, "The way of the gods." Kapiolani, "The captive of Heaven." The names of the chiefs are prohibited, or kabu, to the commoners.

The motives which lead to a choice of names for their children, among the common people, may be estimated by the following fact. One of the pupils of the mission, belonging to the family of a chief, is named Wai-lepo-lepo. His father was a personal attendant of Kamehameha.

The king called on him one day for a drink of water ; the man, in his haste to procure it, took into the calabash that which was not perfectly pure ; and the king, as soon as he tasted it, dashed the whole, calabash and all, at the head of the fellow, exclaiming, "wai-lepo-lepo !" "dirty—dirty water !" On going to his house, the servant found a newborn son, which he immediately named Wai-leo-lepo, — a phrase not likely to be forgotten by him, even without such means of remembrance.

From the schedule of rank given, the complicated, and in some instances shocking, affinity of the chiefs may be learned. All of the first grade, except the prime minister, besides their present relations, are cousins to each other by blood. Keopuo-lani was at once the cousin, niece, and wife of Kamehameha. Three of the wives of Liholiho are his half-sisters ; and one was also the wife of her step-father, and his own father Kamehameha ; and Kaumuali, the king of Kauai, and his son Kealii-honui, are both at present, the husbands of Kaahumanu. Kapiolani also has two husbands.

There appears ever to have been close alliances by marriage among the chiefs of the whole group : but till the conquest of Kamehameha, each island, and often different districts of the same island, were subject to separate and independent kings, and the whole government had more of the feudal form than it now has. All the chiefs being descended more or less directly from former kings, the jealousy and rivalry peculiarly incident to an uncivilized state might make the stability of the present dynasty doubtful, but for a balance of power kept by the opposing ambition and conflicting interests of the two connexions next in rank and influence to the reigning family : those of the Maui, or Adams family, as it is sometimes called — consisting of the governors of Hawaii and Maui, and the queens dowager — and the prime minister's, or Pitt family. These share equally in the favor of the king, and in the honors of the nation : and such is the equality of their power, that an attempt at revolt or usurpation by either, could not be successful, so long as the other remained faithful to the king. That they should combine to overthrow the royal family, is scarcely possible : for though in such case they might be successful, the interests of one only of the parties could be promoted, while the other would have hazarded everything without the prospect of an advancement. The certainty therefore is, they will both remain loyal; and so long as that is the case, the present government must be permanent.

This balance of power we consider a happy circumstance; for by it, far greater facilities for the achievement of our enterprise are afforded, than could be otherwise be secured. The most formidable impediments yet experienced to the success of missions in the Polynesian islands have arisen from the rivalry and wars of the petty kings of independent districts and islands.

The government is a despotism; and the rank of the king and of the chiefs, hereditary. All rights of property and power are vested in the throne, and are at the disposal of the king, whose will and word alone are law; though in important measures he usually takes the sentiment of the chiefs in council. The appointments of office, such as governors of islands and districts, commanders of forts, &c. &c. are made only by the king.

The support of the king is by an annual tribute from all the islands, rendered at different periods by different districts and islands, as his majesty may direct. It consists of the produce of the country: hogs, dogs, fish, fowls, potatoes, yams, kalo, bananas, melons, &c. &c.; of articles of manufacture: canoes, fishing-nets, kapa, mats, birds' feathers, unwrought hemp, &c. &c.; and, since the introduction of trade with foreigners, of sandal-wood, and occasionally of specie. Besides this tribute, however, the king has power to levy any extra tax he pleases, and even to appropriate to his own use, by direct and unintimated seizure, any personal possession of a chief or other subject. Not unfrequently the whole growth of a plantation is thus borne off by the servants of his household, without the slightest apology or compensation.

The revenue of the throne has been greatly augmented of late years, by the charges placed on the port of Honolulu. The pilotage, both on entering and leaving, is one dollar a foot on the draft of each vessel; for an anchorage

The exaction of harbor fees originated in a circumstance somewhat peculiar. Kamehameha in his shrewdness early discovered that the foreign merchants trading with him were making large profits on the sandal-wood shipped by them from the islands for the Chinese market; and determined himself to send a cargo of wood to Canton, in a ship he had just purchased. She was laden with a large quantity of this article; and despatched under the command of English officers, with a native crew, and Kapihe, or Captain Jack, as supercargo. It was not for the interest of foreigners that the voyage should prove successful; and by some means, fair or foul, when the ship made her appearance off the islands on her return — the broad pennant of her commander and the Hawaiian flag floating as triumphantly in the breeze as if she bore the richest freight of damasks and crapes, nankeens and china — and the king in his gladness quickly boarded her, all her cargo was found to be a bill of charges amounting to three thousand dollars! In the items of the bill were pilotage and anchorage, and custom-house fees to a large sum; and when told that maritime states in other countries derived large revenues in this manner, he immediately said, "Well then, I will have fees for my harbor too;" and from that time the harbor at Oahu has been taxed in the amount mentioned.

The king and highest chiefs have a singular mode of raising money, and one I presume entirely peculiar to themselves. It is by building a fine new house; and on taking possession of it, to refuse an entrance to any one without a present in cash, proportionate to the rank and property both of the giver and receiver. The kabu on the house of the king at the time of our arrival, was of this nature. Many of the chiefs presented fifty, sixty, and eighty dollars; merchants, sea-captains, and foreign residents, twenty and thirty; and every servant of the household, even his pipe-lighter, at least two dollars. The whole sum thus collected amounted to several thousand dollars. A few months ago the mother-queen raised eight hundred dollars in the same manner.

The governors of islands and chiefs of districts are entitled, by their offices, to an exercise of all the prerogatives of royalty in their respective limits. They each, like the king, have their annual tribute from the people; and, like him, hold the lives and property of all under them at caprice.

All the chiefs have large landed estates under the king; and derive their support from yearly taxes upon them. Like the king and governors, they have every right, even to that of life, over the occupants of their plantations, and all their people.

The nobles of the land are so strongly marked by their external appearance, as at all times to be easily distinguishable from the common people. They seem indeed in size and stature to be almost a distinct race. They are all large in their frame, and often excessively corpulent; while the common people are scarce of the ordinary height of Europeans, and of a thin rather than full habit. Keopuolani, the mother of Liholiho, and Kaumualii, king of Kauai, are the only chiefs arrived at years of maturity, I have yet seen, who are not heavy, corpulent persons. The governess of Kauai, the sister of Kaumualii, is said to be remarkably so; Namahama, one of the queens of Kamehameha, is exceedingly corpulent; her sisters, Kaahumanu and Kalakua, nearly the same; and her brother Kuakini, governor of Hawaii, though little more than twenty-five years old, is so remarkably stout as to be unequal to any exertion, and scarcely able to walk without difficulty. This immense bulk of person is supposed to arise from the care taken of them from their earliest infancy; and from the abundance and nutritious quality of their food, especially that of poe, a kind of paste made from the kalo, an esculent root, a principal article of diet. They live on the abundant resources of the land and sea; and, free from all toil and oppression, their only care is, "to eat, to drink, and to be merry."

Many of those whose corpulency does not amount to deformity, are among the noblest figures imaginable. Ke-hikili, or "Thunder," a chief of the Maui family, though a savage in countenance, in form and muscle is a perfect Hercules. Kealiihonui, of Kauai, has a handsome face, and in the classic drapery of a yellow satin malo and purple satin kihei, presents as perfect a model of manly beauty as ever challenged the efforts of pencil or chisel. Many of the common people, too, have great beauty of person, though on a less noble scale. Only a few mornings ago, in walking on the plain, I met a young man, eighteen or twenty years old, whose figure struck me as one of the most admirable I ever beheld. His black eye sparkled with youth and spirit; and every motion was free as the wind, in which his light mantle flowed gracefully from his shoulder. As with firm and elastic tread he hurried past, a bright smile accompanied his salutation, "Aloha oe," Love to you: in returning which I almost involuntarily said, "Aloha no ia oe, e Apollo," Love indeed to you, thou Apollo!

Besides a profusion of melons, cocoanuts, bananas, sugarcane, &c. &c., some of which they are almost constantly eating, the chiefs have regular meals of baked dog or pig, and pickled or raw fish and poe, four times a day: one as soon as they rise in the morning; another at ten or eleven o'clock, A. M.; a third about four in the afternoon; and a fourth at nine or ten in the evening.

Their food was formerly served in wooden dishes and calabashes; but now generally on china brought by the merchants from Canton. It is placed on the ground, before the group for whom it is designed, who, lounging on their mats in the attitude of the ancient Romans, partake of it with one hand, while they recline upon the other. Servants separate the meat with their hands, wiping them occasionally in their mouths or, on their naked arms or legs; after which, all eat from the same dishes, using their fingers in place of forks and spoons.

Whatever pets the ladies may have, whether pigs or dogs, and most have one of either, share from the common dishes without disturbance, unless perhaps they should be so ill-bred as to put their fore-feet, as well as their noses, into the food, when a gentle tap may remind them of better manners.

The pets of the nobles, of whatever kind, have in many cases unlimited privileges. There is at present attached to the palace a hog of this character, weighing four or five hundred pounds, called Kaahumanu, after the haughty dowager of that name, which is permitted to range at pleasure, within doors as well as without; and not unfrequently finds a bed among the satins and velvets of the royal couches.

The chiefs, male and female, are at once known, not only by their size, but by their walk, general air, and manners. In these respects, there is as marked a difference between them and the "maki ainana," or ignoble vulgus, here, as there is between the courtiers of St. James or the Tuilleries, and the peasantry of England or France. A consciousness of natural superiority, and the pride of adventitious distinction, imbibed and nourished from their earliest childhood, give them an ease of action, and an unaffected dignity of deportment, that would distinguish them as persons of rank, in whatever company they might appear. You must not understand from this, however, true as it is, that there is anything Chesterfieldian or artificial in their breeding. They are still uncivilized heathen, living not only in all the simplicity, but in all the vulgarity of untutored nature: and while I can sincerely say, that in them "I see much that I love, and more that I admire," I must in candor add, "and much that I abhor."

Many of them, besides large landed possessions, have considerable wealth in money, accumulated by the sale of sandal-wood; and in large quantities of rich foreign manufacture. When the missionaries arrived in 1820, the usual, and indeed only dress, except in the case of one or two individuals, was the native costume; but now most of the chiefs constantly wear a part or whole of the European dress: the females, on ordinary occasions, a loose slip, with the native pau or petticoat over it, and the men, a shirt or wrapper.

On Sundays and holidays, and all occasions of ceremony, they appear in full dress, after our fashions, and frequently of the richest material. There are several good tailors among the foreign residents, and the clothes of the men are generally well and fashionably made. The men also often send their measures by the trading ships to Canton, and have ready-made dresses brought back to them. Only a short time since, the king received four hundred garments at one time in this way.

The females do not look so well, or so much at ease in their dresses, as the men; though the ladies of the mission have much of their leisure occupied in sewing for them, and in teaching them to cut and sew for themselves. Kameha-malu has become quite skillful in this respect; and I doubt not that others will imitate her example, and here, as in other parts of the world, the sex will claim its prerogative to precedence in all matters of taste and fashion. Some of the ladies of the court, I am told, have talked already of eating less poe than they have done, that their persons may be more delicate and their clothes sit better.

The houses of the chiefs are generally large for the kind of building — from forty to sixty feet in length, twenty or twenty-five in breadth, and eighteen or twenty in height at the peak of the roof. The sides and ends, as well as the roof, are of thatch, and the whole in one apartment. They are generally without windows or any opening for light or air, except a wide door in the middle of a side or end. In the back part of the house, the personal property and moveables, such as trunks, boxes, calabashes and dishes for water, food, &c. are deposited, while the mats for sitting, lounging, and sleeping, are spread near the door.

Every chief has from thirty to fifty and an hundred personal attendants, friends, and servants, attached to his establishment, who always live and move with him, and share in the provisions of his house. All these, except the bosom friends, or punahale, have different offices and duties: one is a pipe-lighter, another a spittoon-carrier, a third a kahile-bearer, &c. Others with their families, prepare, cook and serve the food, &c. All the former, from the bosom friend, or punahale, to the pipe-lighter, eat from the same dishes and calabashes with their master, and form at their meals a most uncouth and motley group. In every respect, indeed, as well as in that of eating, the household servants of the whole company of chiefs, from the king to the petty headman of a village, seem to enjoy a perpetual saturnalia.

The formation of this establishment takes place immediately on the birth of a chief, whether male or female. A kahu, or nurse, is appointed, who assumes all the care of the parent, and directs the affairs of the child until he is old enough to exercise a will of his own. Thus, often, very little intercourse takes place between the parents themselves and the young chief—the former not unfrequently residing at a different district, or on a different island. The present prince and princess, who are both children, have each separate houses and a large train of attendants; and though their guardians of state reside near them, they are left very much to their own will, or to that of their kahus, or nurses.

I have seen a young chief, apparently not three years old, walking the streets of Honolulu as naked as when born, with the exception of a pair of green morocco shoes on his feet, followed by ten or twelve stout men, and as many boys, carrying umbrellas, and kahiles, and spit-boxes, and fans, and the various trappings of chieftainship. The young noble was evidently under no control but his own will, and enjoyed already the privileges of his birth in choosing his own path, and doing whatever he pleased.

This portion of the inhabitants spend their lives principally in eating and drinking, lounging and sleeping; in the sports of the surf, and the various games of the country; at cards, which have long been introduced; in hearing the songs of the musicians, a kind of recitation accompanied with much action; and in witnessing the performances of the dancers. They are not, however, wholly given to idleness and pleasure. It is customary for the male chiefs to superintend in a degree, any work in which their own vassals, at the place where they are residing, are engaged, whether of agriculture or manufacture. The female chiefs, also, overlook their women in their appropriate occupations, and not unfrequently assist them with their own hands.

A great change appears about to take place among the chiefs in the general manner of employing time. The palapala and the pule, letters and religion, as presented by the missionaries, are happily beginning deeply to interest their minds; and books and slates, I doubt not, will, as is the fact already in individual cases, soon universally take the place of cards and games, and every amusement of dissipation.

These general and desultory remarks will give you, dear M——, some idea of the external character and state of the nobler part of the nation, for whose benefit H—— and myself have sacrificed the innumerable enjoyments of home. As to their qualities of heart and mind, they in general appear to be as mild and amiable in disposition, and as sprightly and active in intellect, as the inhabitants of our own country. Ignorance, superstition, and sin, make all the difference we observe; and though that difference is at present fearful indeed, still we believe that with the removal of its causes, it will be entirely done away.

Notwithstanding the dreadful abominations daily taking place around us, drunkenness and adultery, gambling and theft, deceit, treachery and death, all which exist throughout the land to an almost incredible degree, such has already been the success attending the efforts at reformation made in the very infancy of the mission, that we are encouraged by every day's observance, with fresh zeal to dedicate ourselves to the work of rescue and salvation. No pagan nation on earth can be better prepared for the labor of the Christian missionary; and no herald of the cross could desire a more privileged and delightful task than to take this people by the outstretched and beckoning hand, and lead their bewildered feet into paths of light and life, of purity and peace; nor a greater happiness than to be the instrument of guiding, not only the generation now living, in the right way, but of rescuing from wretchedness and spiritual death millions of the generations yet unborn, who are here to live and here, to die, before the appointed angel "shall lift up his hand to Heaven, and swear that there shall be time no longer."

CHAPTER VII.

TEMPORARY RESIDENCE AT HONOLULU.

Thursday, May 20. An opportunity of making our voyage to Hawaii has not yet been presented. I am anxious to commence the contemplated tour, though every day more and more persuaded, from what I find to be the state of the common people, that it will be attended with great privation, and with much to annoy and to disgust.

This class of the inhabitants constitutes at least one hundred and forty-nine thousand of the one hundred and fifty thousand supposed at present to be the population of the group. In external appearance, and manners and habits of life, the kanakas, or common natives, present a strong contrast to the chiefs; and are indeed a wretched people, subject not only to a total blindness of mind and heart, but also to the most abject poverty. If the former are the objects of an interest to the missionary approaching to admiration, the latter are of a compassion that sometimes borders on agony; and in beholding their degradation, and the near approach they make to the level of the brute, I am often ready

And hang my head, to think myself a man.”

The greatest wealth they can boast consists of a mat on which to sleep, a few folds of kapa to cover them, one calabash for water and another for poe, a rude implement or two for the cultivation of the ground, and the instruments used in their simple manufactures. Kalo, potatoes and salt, with occasionally a fish, constitute their general food, while all else that they grow, or take, and every result of their labor, goes to meet the series of taxes levied by the king and his governors, and their own respective chiefs.

The spontaneous production of the islands is very limited; and labor at all times of the year is necessary to the support of life. In this respect this group differs widely from the Society and other islands of the South Seas, where, eight months in twelve, the natives have only to pluck their food, principally bread-fruit, from the trees overhanging their habitations. Their growth of the bread-fruit here is confined to a few districts on one or two islands, and where found, yields a very partial supply of food, at any season.

Kalo, an article which I have repeatedly mentioned, is the principal food of the Sandwich-islanders, and to the whole nation answers the double purpose of vegetables and bread. The genus of plant to which it belongs is the arum; a root growing in many parts of America, and generally known there by the names of the wild, Indian, and French turnip. The kalo is the arum esculentum of botanists; and is used in many other warm climates as a vegetable.

It here occupies most of the cultivated ground, especially such as is capable of being overflowed by water; and the planting, irrigation, and necessary care of it, forms the most laborious part of the native farming. The islanders have arrived at great skill in the cultivation of this plant; and perhaps their mode of growing it, considering the general face of the country, scarce admits of improvement, unless it be in the implements with which they work. The beds in which the kalo stands are usually square or oblong of various sizes, from that of a few yards to half an acre. These are formed with great care; first by excavating the earth to a depth of two or three feet, and converting the dirt thrown out into strong embankments on every side. The sides and bottom are then beaten with the woody ends of the cocoa-nut leaf, which are broad, and, when dry, exceedingly hard, till they are impervious to water: after which, the tops of the ripe root, by which the plant is propagated, cut off just below the formation of the leaves, are set out eighteen inches or two feet apart, in a thin layer of soil and dried grass, and the water let upon them till the leaves float on its surface. The roots are kept thus covered with water, till they become fit to eat: a period of from nine to fifteen months, though they continue to grow for two years or more, and improve in quality to the end of that time.

The leaves of the kalo are large and heart-shaped, and of a light green color. The root is of a regular oval form, from four to eight inches in length, and from six to twelve in circumference. In its natural state, whether ripe or unripe, both the leaves and root have all the acrid pungent taste of the genus of plants to which it belongs; but on being thoroughly cooked, either by baking or boiling, it becomes mild and palatable, without any peculiarity of taste, more than belong to good bread. It is compact, and, both before and after cooking, white, with a slight tinge of purple on the exterior; when poor or unripe, the color throughout is a dull lead.

The natives prepare it for use, first by baking it in the only manner practiced among them. This is by digging a hole in the ground a foot or two deep, and five or six feet in circumference, and placing a layer of stones on the bottom, upon which light wood is piled and a fire kindled. Other stones are laid upon the fire, and by the burning of wood the whole becomes ignited. Those on the top are then drawn off, and the kalo, or potatoes, or fish, pig, or dog, &c. closely wrapped in the leaves of the banana, or of the ki — dracæna terminalis, growing in great abundance here — is laid on the hearth of stones still remaining at the bottom, and immediately covered with the rest. A little water is poured on the pile to create a steam, and the whole hastily buried with earth, by which the heat and steam are kept from escaping, and the article in the umai or oven, becomes baked.

The kalo, after being thus cooked, is in the next place made into the favourite poe. The process in this is simple, though so laborious as to be performed by the men. It is merely by beating the kalo upon a short plank of hard wood, slightly hollowed in the middle like a tray, with a stone something in the shape of a thick and clumsy pestle, wetting it occasionally with water, and moulding it till it becomes an adhesive mass like dough. It is then put into a calabash, diluted with water till of the consistency of paste, and set aside for fermentation. This soon takes place, and the poe is fit for use in a day or two, though preferred when four or five days old. It is eaten by thrusting the fore-finger of the right hand into the mass, and securing as much as will adhere to it in passing it to the mouth, with a hasty revolving motion of the hand and finger. The only name of the fore-finger is derived from this use of it, "Ka lima poe," "the finger poe or poe finger." The second finger is often also used, and not unfrequently the thumb at the same time. This is the usual mode of eating it — a dozen or more from one calabash; but I have seen the calabash taken up with both hands, and applied to the mouth as in drinking; and thus passed from one to another, round the whole group.

Hard or dry poe is kalo baked and beaten in the manner described, but not moistened with water. It is not much eaten in this state; but is packed in small bundles, and bound in leaves, to be diluted and formed into soft poe at pleasure. In this manner it will keep without injury for months; and makes a principal article in the sea stores of the native vessels.

We find the kalo a pleasant vegetable. It is most excellent when cut into slices and fried, after being baked or boiled, though less nutritive than in the form of poe.

Next to kalo, the sweet potato is a principal article of cultivation. The yam also is grown; but chiefly at the leeward islands, Kauai and Nihau. Indian corn has been introduced, and will probably become extensively an article of food. Other esculent plants, cabbages, onions, pumpkins, squashes, cucumbers, beans, radishes, &c. the seeds of which have been brought by the missionaries and other foreigners, are becoming abundant: but they are cultivated almost exclusively for the refreshment of ships, and the tables of foreign residents. Sugar cane, and a great variety of the plantain and banana, are indigenous, and occupy a considerable portion of every plantation. The cane, however, is used by the natives only as a fruit. Water-melons and musk-melons were introduced by Vancouver, and are now abundant everywhere.

In the cultivation of the ground, the making and care of artificial fish-ponds, a part of the possession of every chief, may be included. These are constructed much in the manner of the kalo plantations; and after the water is let into them, are filled with young fish from the sea, principally the fry of the grey mullet, a fish of which the chiefs are particularly fond.

The building of houses, construction of canoes, making of fishing nets, wooden dishes and bowls, &c. are labors assigned to the men; while the manufacture of cloth in all its processes, and the platting of mats, &c. fall to the department of the women.

The cloth is of tedious manufacture. It is formed from the inner bark of the mourus papyrifera, or paper mulberry, here called wauki, and cultivated for this purpose, in regular groves on every farm. The plant is kept trimmed to a single shoot, from its earliest growth, to secure a stem unbroken by branches; and when it has attained the thickness of an inch or two, and the height of ten or twelve feet, is cut down for use. The bark is taken off in a single piece, by a longitudinal incision from end to end; the exterior coat scraped off; and the interior of each piece spread out, and rolled together in its length, and left till it has acquired a flat surface. The whole is then placed in water, till it becomes covered with a mucilaginous substance; after which it is laid on a plank, and beaten with a short square stick of hard wood, to the tenuity desired. Its length and breadth are increased at pleasure by the addition of the bark; and should any part become too thin before the whole has received an even texture, the difficulty is obviated in the same way. After the whole is of the texture and size required, it is laid in the sun to bleach and dry.

The wooden sticks or mallets, used in beating, have one side smooth, another coarsely grooved, the third very finely furrowed in the same manner, and the fourth more or less closely checked in squares or diamonds: and thus, according to the side used in beating, a corresponding figure is given to the body of the cloth. That beaten with the plain side, is smooth like paper; that with the coarse groove, has something the appearance of dimity; that with the close, more like corded muslin; and that with the check, like the web of fine diaper.

The thickness of the different kinds of cloth is various. I have seen females with mantles of it, as thin and transparent as Italian crape; which, at a short distance, it greatly resembled. That generally used for malos and paus, is more compact, like paper. The kiheis of the men and covers for sleeping, are still firmer and thicker, and are composed of several sheets of the former, spread with a gelatinous wash made from the gum of a tree, and then beaten together. There is a kind still superior in texture and beauty, worn by the chiefs both for malos and paus : it is made of the best bark, and is as thick as morocco, to which, stamped with the brightest colors, and glazed with a composition having the effect of varnish, it bears a striking resemblance. The kapa moe, or cloth for sleeping, is the largest in size ; each sheet, ten of which, fastened together at one end, form a bed-cover, being as large as an ordinary counterpane.

The kapa is naturally of a light color, and capable of being bleached till perfectly white. Much of it is worn in this state ; but the greater portion is stained with a variety of dyes, extracted with much skill from different indigenous plants. The colors are often very beautiful, principally green of every shade, from the lightest to the darkest ; yellow, from a dark salmon to a straw color ; red, from a rich crimson to a delicate blossom ; purple, from a dark plum through all the hues of lilac to a light dove ; brown, from chocolate to fawn ; and black and white. The cloth is dyed with one of these plain throughout, and worn thus ; or is again stamped with several others, in an endless variety and combination of figures. These they devise with much ingenuity and taste, or imitate skillfully from those on imported articles.

The pattern intended to be impressed upon the cloth is cut on the inside of a piece of bamboo. The bamboo is then dipped into the color prepared, carefully transferred to the kapa, and pressed closely upon it with the fingers and hand ; it is then returned into the dye again, and again placed upon the cloth, till the whole piece is covered with the figure and color or colors.

The best made and colored kapa is little inferior in beauty to most common calicoes and chintzes, but so perishable in its quality, as to be an expensive article of clothing. Some kinds are saturated with the oil of the cocoa-nut, to make them more durable and to shed water ; but even these quickly wear out, and require to be renewed every few weeks. That which is not oiled does not allow of being washed; and a new suit is necessary once a month. An immense deal of time and labor must therefore be requisite to meet the demands of the whole population.

The manufacture, by the females, next in importance to the making of kapa, is that of mats, which form the seats of the islanders in the day and their beds at night. The lounges and beds of the chiefs are generally eight or ten feet square, and consist of many thicknesses of these, from a dozen to thirty and forty, and even a greater number. The materials of which they are made are of two kinds; one, a species of rush, and the other, the leaves of the hala, a palm, the pandanus odorotissimus. Those of the last article are most valuable, as they are much the most durable, and admit of frequent washing, which the rush mats do not. Both kinds are woven or braided by hand, without the aid of frame or instrument; and though often twenty feet square, and even larger, are finished with great evenness of texture and regularity of shape. Some of the hala mats are very coarse; and others of various braid, to the very finest and most beautiful specimens of matting I have ever seen. These last, however, are generally small, finished with a deep fringe at the ends; and carried on the arm of a servant, after his chief, to be spread on other mats, on which he may choose to sit. I have observed one of this kind, in the train of the young princess, of a braid almost as delicate and even as that of a Leghorn hat, and of the most beautiful whiteness.

The rush mats are soft and pleasant, and many of them very fine. The leeward islands, Kauai and Nihau, are most distinguished by the manufacture of these. They are there ornamented, with much taste and ingenuity, by stained grass, of a rich and glossy brown, interwoven with the body of the mat, or wrought on its upper surface, in the manner of embroidery, in a variety of figures, such as diamonds, stars, stripes, waving lines, &c. &c.

Besides being engaged in these manufactures of cloth and mats, the females, especially those attached to the households of the chiefs, spend much time in making articles of ornament; in the braiding of human hair for necklaces; trimming and arranging feathers for wreaths and kahiles; polishing tortoise shell and the ivory of whale's teeth, for finger rings, and the handles of feathered staffs, &c.

Notwithstanding the variety of apparently necessary employment falling both to men and women, few of either sex devote more than four or five hours of the twenty-four to work. Though unavoidably more laborious than many other Polynesians, they partake of the indolence of character incident to the inhabitants of tropical climates, and sleep and lounge away more than half their time, while much of the remainder is given to amusement and pleasure. It is, however, difficult to determine how far the Sandwich-islanders partake of this indolence, from the fact that there is no motive for industry presented to them, beyond the fear of starvation, and a dread of the displeasure of their chiefs.

One of the strongest inducements to labor—that of a right of property—is entirely unknown. Were not this the case, the profit which every farmer might derive from the visit of ships for refreshments, would soon cause the face of the country to assume a new aspect. But this means of emolument is a monopoly of the king and chiefs; and only proves a new source of oppression to the people, by increasing their toil, without adding to their possessions. Two-thirds of the proceeds of anything a native brings to the market, unless by stealth, must be given to his chief; and, not unfrequently, the whole is unhesitatingly taken from him. In two or three instances, when conversing on the beach with the officers of the ships, I have seen money just put into the hands of a native, by them, for a bunch of fruit slipped from under his kihei into their boat, taken directly, and openly, away, by some one appointed to detect any traffic of the kind; and whose proceeding was not for a moment to be questioned or resisted.

Nor is there greater inducement to industry, from motives of immediate personal enjoyment. Any increase of stock, or growth of a plantation, beyond that necessary to meet the usual taxes, is liable to be swept off at any hour; and that, perhaps, without any direct authority from king or chief, but at the caprice of some one in their service. An instance of this kind lately occurred at Oahu, which will shew the extremity, if not the extent, of these deprivations. The poverty of many of the people is such, that they seldom secure a taste of animal food, and live almost exclusively on kalo and salt. A poor man of this description, by some means obtained the possession of a pig, when too small to make a meal for his family. He secreted it at a distance from his house, and fed it till it had grown to a size sufficient to afford the desired repast. It was then killed, and put into an oven, with the same precaution of secrecy; but when almost prepared for appetites whetted by long anticipation to an exquisite keenness, a caterer of the royal household unhappily came near, and, attracted to the spot by the savory fumes of the baking pile, deliberately took a seat till the animal was cooked, and then bore off the promised banquet without ceremony or apology!

Such is the civil condition of the mass of the nation. Their only birthright is slavery; and its highest immunities cannot secure to them a right of life, much less any inferior possession. Surely to such, the messages of salvation must prove indeed "glad tidings of great joy." May they receive them with thanksgiving; and, through them, become free in the spirit of the gospel, and rich in the inheritance of eternal life!

May 22. Last night I strolled a mile through the marshes and fish-ponds, along the beach south of the mission house. In attempting to give you a sketch of my walk, you will almost think me sporting with your credulity, by a picture of poverty and filthiness too degrading to be real. The largest hut I passed was not higher than my waist; capable only of containing a family like pigs in a sty, on a bed of dried grass filled with fleas and vermin. Not a bush or shrub was to be seen around, or any appearance whatever of cultivation. It was the time of their evening repast; and most of the people were seated on the ground, eating poe, surrounded by swarms of flies, and sharing their food with dogs, pigs and ducks, who helped themselves freely from the dishes of their masters. The tout ensemble was almost too disgusting to be looked on; and while gazed I could but exclaim,

“Can this be man?
 Bone of the bone and flesh of the flesh of him
 Whose majesty dignifies and crowns creation's plan —
 And without whom, 'twere wild profusion all,
 And bootless waste?”

The hope of enlightening and elevating such seemed almost rashness; and I turned from them more than ever persuaded that nothing less than the power which first spake light from darkness can scatter the gloom in which they are enveloped.

I should be doing injustice to your wish and expectations — of having the manners and habits of the people on points capable of being touched, and there are not a few that can never be mentioned, presented to you “living as they rise” — were I to pass in silence subjects which, though not the most pleasant that might be selected, daily and hourly obtrude themselves on the observation. Among these is the prevalence of a most infectious and loathsome cutaneous disease — not altogether unknown in our own country. This contagion is so common, and I might say universal here in all ranks, as to be without reproach, except in the eyes of a foreigner. I was somewhat startled, a day or two after our arrival, to have the question put to me, “Whether I had any thing to cure the itch?” immediately after shaking hands with a high chief whom I at once perceived to be greatly infected with it. The etiquette of the court seemed to require this manner of salutation; and I thought it would be impossible for me to escape the disorder, even for a week. I learned from the older missionaries, however, that they had shaken hands with thousands with perfect impunity, and thus far I have myself been equally fortunate.

It must be less contagious than the disease known in America by the same name, and appears, also, to be less irritable and troublesome. Most of the chiefs are at present free from it, but the common people are everywhere greatly infected. Few seem to regard it as an evil, or take any measure to divest themselves of it. Like most other diseases, its introduction is attributed, by the natives, to foreigners; though I suspect it has existed among them to “a period to which the memory of man runneth not contrary.”

Not to mention the frequent and hideous marks of a scourge which more clearly than any other proclaims the curse of a God of purity — and which, while it annually consigns hundreds of this people to the tomb, converts thousands while living into walking sepulchres — the inhabitants, generally, are subject to many disorders of the skin. The majority are more or less disfigured by eruptions and sores, and many are as unsightly as lepers. The number, of either sex or of any age, who are free from blemishes of the kind, is very small; so much so, that a smooth and unbroken skin is far more uncommon here than the reverse is at home.

I am not physiologist enough to say to what cause this fact is attributable; perhaps to a very free use of salt in eating, in conjunction with the habit of constant sea-bathing. Kalo, too, when in the form of poe, though of easy digestion, has probably a great tendency to grossness of blood. Whatever the cause or causes may be, the effect certainly detracts much from the good appearance of the people.

Another subject, which I would notice from the same reason that led to the introduction of the preceding, is nearly allied to it, according to our ideas, in point of offensiveness. A clue to this may be given without a mention of names, by referring you to the spirited effusion of a genius, beginning

Had the bard of Ayr lived on these coral-bound shores, the novelty of the sight at least would never have induced him to immortalize by song, the excursions of one of that disgusting race. In our humble kirk, in place of one on “Miss’s Bonnet,” dozens may at any time be seen sporting among the decorated locks of ignoble heads; while, not unfrequently, a privileged few wend their way through the garlands of princes of the blood, or triumphantly mount the coronets of majesty itself!

As to the servants of the chiefs, and the common people, we think ourselves fortunate indeed if, after a call of a few minutes, we do not find living testimonies of their visit on our mats and floors, and even on our clothes and persons! The bare relation of the fact, without the experience of it, is sufficiently shocking. But the half is not told; and I scarce dare let truth here run to its climax. The lower classes not only suffer their heads and kapas to harbor these vermin, but they openly and unblushingly eat them! Yet so fastidious are they in point of cleanliness, that an emetic could scarce be more efficaciously administered than to cause them to eat from a dish in which a fly had been drowned! So much for the force of custom and the power of habit.

They have, by some, been called a cleanly people in their persons and food; but with these facts in view, which cannot be denied — and to which may be added, long and dirty nails, like the talons of birds, &c. — it is difficult to allow them a right to the epithet, notwithstanding the practice of spending hours together in the foamings of the surf or the dashings of the mountain torrent, and the punctilious observance of the ceremony of washing, at least the fingers, before and after their meals.

May 24. When last in Schenectady, I was particularly requested to make inquiry respecting Anthony Allen, an African, residing on this island, once the servant of a gentleman of that city. He is quite a respectable man, and has a very neat establishment, consisting of a dozen houses built in the native manner and covered with mud: one for sitting and sleeping, one for eating, another for a store-house, another for milk, a kitchen, blacksmith's shop, &c. &c. He owns large flocks of goats and a few cows, and supplies the tables of many of the residents with milk. He also keeps a kind of boarding-house for seamen. By these means, and the cultivation of a small farm which he holds under Hevaheva, the ex-high-priest, he obtains a comfortable support for himself and wife, a modest native, and three children. He has been very kind to us in sending melons, bananas, several kids, and a regular daily supply of milk from his goats.

His plantation is two miles from the mission house, on the plain towards Waikiki. The road to it, although the plain is uncultivated and entirely unshaded, affords the most pleasant walk in the immediate vicinity of Honolulu. The mountains are too distant to be reached in an hour's ramble, and the shore is lined only with fish-ponds and marshes. Everything short of the mountains is sunburnt and dreary. There is not a tree near us, much less groves, in whose shade we might find shelter from the heat of a torrid sun; no babbling brooks, no verdant lawn, no secluded dell or glade, for the enjoyment of solitude and thought; indeed, nothing that ever formed part of a scene of rural delight.

The number of foreigners residing at the islands is far greater than I supposed. Four American mercantile houses — two of Boston, one of New-York, and one of Bristol, Rhode-Island — have establishments at this port, to which agents and clerks are attached. Their storehouses are abundantly furnished with goods in demand by the islanders; and at them, most articles contained in common retail shops and groceries in America, may be purchased. The whole trade of the four probably amounts to one hundred thousand dollars a year — sandal wood principally, and specie, being the returns for imported manufactures. Each of these trading houses usually has a ship or brig in the harbor, or at some one of the islands; besides others that touch to make repairs and obtain refreshments, in their voyages between the north-west, Mexican and South American coasts, and China. The agents and clerks of these establishments, and the supercargoes and officers of the vessels attached to them, with transient visitors in ships holding similar situations, form the most respectable class of foreigners with whom we are called to have intercourse.

There is another class, consisting of fifteen or twenty individuals, who have dropped all connexion with their native countries, and become permanent residents on different islands; and who hold plantations and other property under the king and various chiefs. Of these, Marini, a Spaniard, interpreter for the government; Rives, a Frenchman, private secretary to Liholiho; Law, a Scotchman, the king's physician, all of Oahu: Young, an Englishman, and Parker, an American, of Hawaii, and Butler, an American, of Maui, are the principal and most known. Marini and Young have been at the islands more than thirty years, and were companions and counsellors of Kamehameha.

The former has accumulated much property, holds many plantations, and owns extensive flocks of goats, and herds of cattle; and is said to have money in fund, both in the United States and in England.

He has introduced the grape, orange, lemon, pine-apple, fig and tamarind trees, but to a very limited extent, and seemingly from a motive entirely selfish; for he has perseveringly denied the seeds, and every means of propagation, to others, and been known even secretly to destroy a growth that had been secured from them without his knowledge. A considerable quantity of wine is made yearly from his vineyard; and his lemons and pines, by sales to ships and in the town, bring quite an income. He has a numerous breed of mules, and several horses, some twenty or thirty of which have within a few years been brought from the coast of California, and are now rapidly increasing. Flocks of beautiful doves, also an importation, are domiciliated at his establishment; and some few miles from the town, along the coast, there is an islet covered with the burrows of English hares, belonging to him.

Besides this class of foreigners, there are between one and two hundred runaway sailors and vagabonds scattered through the group, wanderers on the earth, the very dregs and outcasts of civilized life. These, and I am sorry to say too many others, who, from their birth and education in a Christian land, ought to be examples of rectitude and morality, are the greatest corrupters of this wretched people, and present the most formidable of obstacles to the moral influence of our teaching. Fancying themselves, in this remote part of the world, free from every restraint of God and man, instead of attempting to turn the heathen from their darkness, they encourage them in sin, even become pioneers in iniquity, and the instruments of doubly sealing them, as we fear, in the gloom of spiritual and eternal death.

When the first missionaries reached the Sandwich islands in the spring of 1820, an effort was made by some of the foreigners to have their landing and establishment at the islands forbidden by the government. With this view, their motives were misrepresented by them to the king and chiefs. It was asserted, that while the ostensible object of the mission was good, the secret and ultimate design was the subjugation of the islands and the enslavement of the people: and by way of corroboration, the treatment of the Mexicans, and aborigines of South America and the West-Indies, by the Spaniards, and the possession of Hindostan by the British, were gravely related. It was in consequence of this misrepresentation, that a delay of eight days occurred before the missionaries could secure permission to disembark.

In answer to these allegations, the more intelligent of the chiefs remarked, "The missionaries speak well: they say they have come from America only to do us good: if they intend to seize our islands, why are they so few in number? where are their guns? and why have they brought their wives?" To this it was replied, "It is true, their number is small: a few only have come now, the more fully to deceive. But soon many more will arrive, and your islands will be lost!" The chiefs again answered, "They say that they will do us good; they are few in number; we will try them for one year; and if we find they deceive us, it will then be time enough to send them away." And permission to land was accordingly granted. Mr. Young, I am told, was the only foreigner who advocated their reception.

The jealousy of the government was, notwithstanding, greatly awakened; and all the movements of our friends were closely watched: the king even was led to believe that the digging of the cellar, and the laying of the foundation of the mission house, was the commencement of a fortification, of which the spaces left for windows were the embrasures.

By the close of the first year the missionaries had so far proved to the government the purity of their motive, and the integrity of their character, that the question of their longer continuance was not agitated. Some of the chiefs had already become interested in the instructions commenced in English, and in the services of Christian worship, regularly observed on the Sabbath, and occasionally at other times. The partial acquisition of the language of the country, the formation of an alphabet for the native tongue, the elementary lessons in reading and writing which immediately followed, and chiefly perhaps the PREACHING OF THE GOSPEL, had by the end of the second year confirmed to the missionaries the confidence of the rulers, and began to secure to them decided marks of friendship.

A first effort at opposition having proved thus unsuccessful, another soon made its appearance. The object in this case, was the defeat of the moral influence of Christianity: and the extremity to which some of the foreigners pushed their point, and of the means resorted to for its accomplishment, you may judge from the fact, that the pupils of the first female school collected at this place, by Mrs. Bingham — after being clothed, and brought with much care and attention to habits of neatness and propriety in their persons, and made themselves to be deeply interested in various useful instruction — were borne off openly and forcibly by them, to become their mistresses, while the instructress herself could answer the appeals made to her for protection, only by her tears!

Still the moral influence of Christianity has been felt; and I am persuaded its glorious progress cannot now be stayed. A chief object at present with those opposed to the mission, is the blasting of its character abroad. A vessel scarcely comes to anchor, before the ears of those attached to it are filled with slander and falsehood, in reference to the influence exerted by us. Even Captain Clasby had scarce reached the shore, before he heard the lowest abuse heaped on our associates; and was told by a leading resident, that his passengers should not be permitted to land; that the nation was already nearly ruined by the worthless set of fellows we had come to join!

When a strange ship arrives, and the officers complain of the extravagance of the harbor-fees, this impost is immediately declared to be exacted by the advice of the missionaries: the high prices of articles of refreshment in the market, is assigned to the same cause; though we ourselves are now living almost exclusively on sea biscuit, salt beef and pork, brought from America, two or three years old, and scarce ever taste a banana or melon, because we do not feel at liberty to purchase fresh provisions and vegetables — much less fruit — at the price demanded by the chiefs. Equally untrue is a whole catalogue of charges, by which we are represented as the worst enemies of our countrymen, and of all foreigners ; and the basest of men, both in principles and morals.

The minds of many visitors at the islands are by these means so strongly prejudiced against us, that they do not call at the mission-house ; and in some instances, after a casual introduction, have, on meeting us in the street, passed in haughty silence, and even betrayed a sneer of contempt. And when they take their departure, they bear with them to the coasts of Mexico and Peru and Chili, or to Canton, England, and America, the most erroneous impressions of our influence here, and not unfrequently the lowest slanders on our characters.

When I speak thus of the opposition with which we are obliged to contend, you are not to understand that all foreigners — residents or visitors — are of the character represented. Some of every class are warmly and decidedly our friends, and have our high respect for their rectitude of character, and our sincere gratitude for many favors ; and, inconsistent as it may appear, even those most embittered in their feelings against our object, treat us personally with respect, and often with great kindness. Scarce a week passes, in which donations of a liberal and important character are not conferred on one or another of the family ; and we are often made to feel the obligation of civilities which we have not the means of returning.

The scale of prejudice which was made to bear so heavily against the missionaries on their arrival, has now not only gained its balance, but is beginning to settle with ominous bearing against those who attempted by it to prevent the establishment of the mission. The haughty and powerful queen Kaahumanu was at first exceedingly jealous of the teachers ; and it is only within the last few months, that she has paid a regard to instruction of any kind. She long persisted in her refusals to attempt to learn to read and write, and was but recently induced for the first time to lay aside her cards for a few minutes, and to repeat the alphabet after a missionary : since then, she has, however, become an assiduous scholar ; and has made her books and slate the principal sources of amusement.

Within a day or two, I called upon her in company with Mr. Ellis. Soon after entering, she asked Mr. Ellis for a blank book he had promised to give her; he was obliged to tell her he had not yet made it; and added, "I fear you will think I am deceiving you, by delaying so long to fulfill my promise" — when she hastily interrupted him, saying — "Aole! — aole! ua pau komakou manao ino i ka poe mikanele — ka wahahe wale no kahaoli!" — "No, no! — ended are our evil thoughts of the company of missionaries — false or deceitful only are the foreigners!" — meaning by foreigners, those who had originally misrepresented and traduced the character of the missionaries. She expressed her full determination to serve Jehovah and keep his law, and in the course of the conversation, requested Mr. Ellis to write her a form of prayer for grace at meals, adding, "I know that all things are from Jehovah, and that it is well to give thanks to him for every favor, but without some direction I shall perhaps make crooked work of it."

The same morning we for a moment visited Kapiolani. She is an exceedingly interesting character: and from having been addicted to the grossest intemperance and dissipation, has become perfectly correct in her habits; and is invariably serious and dignified in her deportment. I first saw her at the mission house on the morning of our arrival; and was so forcibly impressed with the neatness of her dress, and the propriety of her whole appearance, as to be led to inquire who she was, and whether she could be a Sandwich-islander. She is deeply interested in the success of the mission; is herself an indefatigable scholar; and shewed us a very handsome writing-desk and table, for which she had just given seventy-five dollars.

Monday Morning, 26. The Sabbath here is a most interesting day to the Christian and missionary. The number of decently dressed heathen who flock to the humble temple of the only true God; the attention and seriousness with which many of them listen to the words of eternal life proclaimed in their own language, by the ambassadors of Jesus Christ; the praises of Jehovah chanted in this untutored tongue — necessarily produce a lively and joyful impression on the pious mind. Of this I saw a pleasing instance only two Sabbaths since. An officer from one of the ships in port, a serious young man, spent the interval between the English and native services with me at the mission house. As the congregation began to assemble, he accompanied me to the door of the chapel, intending to take leave when the exercises should begin, as he was unacquainted with the language, and had been already longer from his ship than he designed; but after standing a few minutes, and seeing hundreds of natives assembling quietly and seriously from various directions, he suddenly exclaimed, while tears glistened in his eyes, "No! — this is too much — I cannot go till I worship with these heathen."

It is also an interesting day to the passing stranger — for on the Sabbath, the real state of the people, struggling from barbarity to civilization, is more observable than at any other time. [Any one of the fabled beings represented as half man and half beast, would be an appropriate emblem of the present national character; and an emblazoned Centaur would, in the view of a herald, furnish his Hawaiian majesty with a very intelligible coat-of-arms.]

Recollecting of how late a date the first improvements here are, there is certainly much to admire; but more in one sense, at which to smile. This fact is conspicuous to the simple looker-on, in nothing more than in dress — the variety and grotesque mixture of which is indescribable. The king, queens, prince, princess, and all the highest chiefs, are, at church, always well, and often richly and fashionably, dressed. But when grouped — which is always the case — with the "Royal Guards," and the several retinues of the chiefs, they present a most incongruous and ridiculous spectacle. The dress of the guards, which is intended to be a "uniform," appears to be the cast-off regimentals of half a dozen different nations, and I had almost said, of as many different centuries. Some suits I think bear strong evidence, prima facie, of having passed through the honorable hardship of the Revolutionary War of America; and I have been half tempted to recognize in others, the parade clothes of the "Bowerstown Artillery," the object of general admiration, when, as a boy, I first visited the wilds of Otsego. You may judge how these, or the like, would appear — a coat and cocked hat, for instance on a native "sans culotte;" or a hat and pantaloons without a coat or shirt; or a hat and shirt alone; all of which varieties may be seen. Some of the officers, however, appear very well, in full new suits of blue, with lace and epaulettes of gold.

There is sometimes, also, an odd mixture of materials in the dress of the chiefs; for example, a rich suit of Canton crape, satin, or silk velvet, with a sailor's check or red flannel shirt, and parti-colored woolen cap, and perhaps one coarse stocking and shoe. I have seen a female, of high rank, and monstrously large, going to church in a loose slip of white muslin, with thick woodman's shoes, and no stockings, a heavy silver-headed cane in her hand, and an immense French chapeau on her head!

On Sunday, too, there is a display of equipage, not seen every day. The chapel being near a half mile from the village, some of the grandeos ride to church: their carriages, to be sure, belong to "the birth-day of invention" — especially the state coach of the late king, which, I presume, was once a tinker's wagon. Kaahumanu and Kaumualii always come in this; the young queens, usually in one more modern and airy, of the kind called Dearborn in America. These vehicles are always drawn by twelve or fifteen natives; their horses not having yet been broken to the harness.

Whether the nobility, here, have been told that those who wish to be considered most genteel, in America, do not go to church till after the services have commenced; or whether the newly introduced duties of the toilette occasion the delay, I cannot determine; but the most stately do not generally arrive at the chapel till some time during the first prayer, which consequently is disturbed by the rumbling of their chariot wheels, the hooting of the rabble that hurry them along the plain, the bustle of alighting, and the parade of entering. You could not avoid smiling were you to see with what dignity some of these saunter up the aisle.

I have been led to these little notices, protracted much beyond my intention when I commenced this date, by the observations unavoidably, and almost unconsciously, made yesterday. I witnessed them all, in the detail in which they are given; and, afterwards, in grand assemblage, by a single coup d'œil, when the meeting was dismissed: with the addition, however, of the lofty umbrellas, and proud kahiles, on the favorable side; and of a party of naked horsemen on the other, who were flying in the distance, mounted without saddle or bridle, except a string of twisted grass, with looks made doubly wild by the streaming of their long hair and ragged kapas in the wind behind.

One or two of the missionaries attend family prayers, at the king's residence, every evening. Last night, at nine o'clock, I accompanied Mr. Ellis and Mr. Chamberlain to this service. Liholiho was just commencing supper, in a large lanai, or bower, by the side of his house. The table was well laid with blue china and cut glass, for about twenty persons; and besides the lamps and spermaceti candles which were burning on it, was surrounded by a glare of torches of the kukui or oil-nut, which, tastefully wrapped in green leaves, made a splendid appearance. The king was seated at the head, with one of his queens on his left, and a favorite chief on his right side. There were about half a dozen others at the table. He immediately ordered room for us to be made on the left of the queen, and begged us to help ourselves to whatever we chose of the variety of soups, meats, and vegetables before us, and to excuse his doing the honors of the table, being "pololi loa," "very hungry," and having just filled his plate with rich turtle soup.

Some of the chiefs do not cook their food on the Sabbath; the king is aware of this, and himself sometimes follows their example; but last night, everything was smoking fresh from the cookhouse; and by way of apology, he remarked, that the hot supper was not prepared for himself, but on account of the "mai," the sick person — Kamehamelu being indisposed — but that everything on the table was killed the day before.

Our own practice is to have our dinner, for the Sabbath, except the vegetables, cooked on Saturday. The preparation of food in the native manner, especially the making of poe and baking of meats, requires the attention of several hours; and the missionaries, in their instructions, have suggested to the chiefs and people, the propriety of preparing their food for the la kabu on the proceeding day. The remark of the king was made, from a knowledge of our opinion on the subject.

After taking a cup of tea, and waiting till his majesty had completed half a dozen courses, we retired from the table, at ten o'clock, to the palace; where the principal part of the chiefs were waiting for the ordinary worship.

Nine o'clock, P. M. This has proved a much more important date than I anticipated when I wrote in the morning. The mission was informed yesterday, that the king's mother is going to Lahaina, on the island of Maui, to reside permanently there; and is extremely desirous that some of the missionaries should accompany her. Mr. Bingham saw her last night on the subject. She said she must have a teacher, to speak the "good word, and pray to God with her;" that she would do everything in her power to make those who might accompany her comfortable; and would delay her voyage, that there might be time for them to prepare to sail with her in the Cleopatra's barge.

A meeting of the mission was, consequently, called this morning, when it was determined, that it was expedient to occupy a station at Lahaina immediately. After agreeing that the choice of persons should be made by electing one by ballot, and allowing him to nominate his colleague, the votes were taken. Very unexpectedly to myself, I was the individual elected, and immediately named Mr. Richards for my associate: we, consequently, are all in confusion, packing up our baggage for a permanent residence on Maui, instead of a visit to Hawaii, and a tour of the island. We are to embark on Wednesday.

CHAPTER VIII.

REMOVAL TO THE ISLAND OF MAUI.

The Cleopatra's Barge, at sea, May 30, 1823. On Wednesday, the 28th, Mr. and Mrs. Richards, H — and myself, B — and C —, with William Kamahoula, and Mr. Loomis, who makes the voyage to see us established at our station, embarked with the queen Keopuolani for Maui.

Our designation was so unexpected, and departure so sudden, that we had scarce leisure to turn a thought on the separation about to take place from our fellow laborers, or to cast a glance of anticipation at the possible trials that might await us, in a distant and solitary district of the islands. The topsails of the barge had long been unfurled as a signal for sailing, before we had completed our preparations, and the last package was scarcely secured, before the farewell hymn and benedictions of our friends were sounding in our ears, and we hurried to the open bosom of the Pacific.

Left to the deliberate contemplation of our position, we almost trembled at the responsibility resting upon us, and at the arduous duties in prospect. Every thought was exquisitely awake to the life on which we had now actually entered. Months indeed had passed since we bade adieu to our country, home, and friends; but during a voyage of 18,000 miles, we had still been surrounded by those we loved; and for the last few weeks, though on heathen shores, we had been calmly reposing in the bosom of a band of intelligent and affectionate Christians, without a participation of their labors and their cares. Such, however, was no longer the case; our eyes now rested only on the uncivilized beings with whom we were to dwell, and our ears were saluted only by the sounds of an unknown and savage tongue. We were fully alive to the contrast; and, in the anticipation of the privations and trials, by which we believe the work in which we are engaged must be accomplished, we could scarce refrain exclaiming,

"Farewell ease — farewell comfort — farewell every worldly joy."

But with these feelings there was no mingling of despondency. No, in the kind providence of God, every circumstance attending our situation is too auspicious to admit the indulgence of any unbelieving fear of the ultimate success of our enterprise.

We had been on board scarce an hour, before the polite and kind attention of those under whose immediate and express patronage we had embarked, made us almost forget that we were not still in the bosom of beloved friends. Our hearts became more than ordinarily elated, in the belief that "unto us is this grace given, that we should preach among the gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ ;" and in the evening, while a splendid moon gave a softened beauty to the receding promontories of Oahu, and brought to light the distant shores of Molokai and Lanai, overtopped by the loftier heights of Maui, we found ourselves almost involuntarily chanting, in the confidence of hope, the favorite anthem :

"Wake, Isles of the South ! your redemption draws near :
No longer repose in the borders of gloom," &c.

Previous to our embarkation, we had but little opportunity to judge, from personal intercourse, of the degree of civilization to which the chiefs have attained in minor points, and were somewhat surprised at the ceremonious attentions paid us. Immediately on reaching the vessel, we were informed that the after-cabin was appropriated exclusively to our use ; though there were not less than two hundred persons on board, many of them high chiefs, with their particular friends ; and we had hardly cleared the harbor, when the steward waited on us, to know what we would order for dinner, and at what hour it should be served.

Mr. Allen had sent us a fine ready-dressed kid, with some melons, for our passage ; and Mrs. Bingham had kindly prepared coffee and other refreshments ; but our table has been so regularly and comfortably spread, that our basket of cold provisions remains untouched. This attention is the more noticeable, because the trouble is entirely on our account, all the natives eating their favorite dishes on their mats on deck. Kalaimoku, from courtesy, very politely took his seat with us the first time we sat down to meal, but excused himself from partaking of the dinner, by saying that he had eaten above.

There was something also in the attentions of the king to his mother, when leaving Honolulu, that had a pleasing effect on our minds. This venerable old lady was the last person that came on board. After we had reached the quarter-deck of the barge, she appeared on the beach, surrounded by an immense crowd, and supported by Liholiho in a tender and respectful manner. He would let no one assist her into the long-boat but himself; and seemed to think of nothing but her ease and safety, till she was seated on her couch, beneath an awning over the main hatch. The king continued to manifest the utmost affection and respect for her till we got under way; and, apparently from the same filial feelings, accompanied us fifteen miles to sea, and left the brig in a pilot-boat, in time barely to reach the harbor before dark.

We are now becalmed under the lee of Lanai, within less than a mile of an inaccessible precipice several hundred feet high, the base of which is lashed with heavy breakers. We had the hope of reaching Lahaina to-night, but now fear that we shall not before sometime to-morrow.

Lahaina, Island of Maui, Saturday Evening, May 31. After a very rough but splendid night, at sunrise this morning the wild mountains that overhang the district of Lahaina were in distinct view, and we advanced rapidly to the anchorage. The settlement is far more beautiful than any place we have yet seen on the islands. The entire district, stretching nearly three miles along the sea-side, is covered with luxuriant groves, not only of the cocoanut, the only tree we have before seen except on the tops of the mountains, but also of the bread-fruit and of the kou — a species of cordia, (cordia sebestena) an ornamental tree, resembling at a distance a large and flourishing, full, round-topped apple-tree — while the banana plant, kapa and sugar-cane are abundant, and extend almost to the beach, on which a fine surf constantly rolls. The picture presented is purely Indian in all its features, from the bare and lofty trunks of the cocoa-palm, with their tufted summits nodding like plumes in the breeze, to the thatch of a rude hut here and there peeping from beneath the broad leaves of the plantain and the richness of more lowly growth — the whole forming a delightful foreground to the noble exhibition of mountain scenery in the distance.

On coming to anchor, Kalaimoku expressed his regret that there was no house at the disposal of himself or queen suitable for our accommodation: and wished us to procure a temporary residence with Mr. Butler, an American established here, till houses could be provided for us by Keopulani. Under the guidance of Mr. Loomis, Mr. Richards and myself accordingly landed for this purpose. We were soon met by Keoua, the governor of Lahaina, to whom I delivered a letter of introduction from his friend Laanui at Oahu, and proceeded in search of the plantation of Mr. Butler.

We found his enclosure pleasantly situated about a quarter of a mile directly in rear of the landing-place, and were received by him in a kind and friendly manner. When acquainted with our object in coming to Lahaina, he proffered every assistance in his power, and tendered his best house for the reception of our families. His civility greatly prepossessed us in his favor, and made us almost forget that we were in the land of strangers. He returned to the barge with us, to bring the ladies on shore; and early in the afternoon our whole number were comfortably and quietly settled in the midst of his luxuriant grounds.

The thick shade of the bread-fruit trees which surround his cottages, the rustling of the breeze through the bananas and the sugar-cane, the murmurs of the mountain streams encircling the yard, and the coolness and verdure of every spot around us, seemed, in contrast with our situation, during a six months' voyage, and four weeks' residence on the dreary plain of Honolulu, like the delights of an Eden; and caused our hearts to beat warmly with gratitude to the Almighty Being who had brought us in safety to the scene of our future labors, and had at once provided us with so refreshing an asylum.

Before dark, the chiefs had all our effects landed and secured in the storehouse of the governor, while our private baggage was brought to the house we occupy by the attendants of the queen. Nor did their attentions cease here. Early in the evening, a supply of ready-cooked provisions with vegetables and fruits, abundantly sufficient for the Sabbath, were sent to us by different individuals. Mr. Butler hospitably prepared our first repast; and, though somewhat fatigued, we are now ready to retire to rest, prepared for the suitable observance of the holy day on which we are bordering. May it be the beginning of many blessed Sabbaths to the degraded inhabitants of Lahaina!

Sabbath, June 1. Early this morning a messenger came to inform us that Keopuolani, the princess, and chiefs, were waiting for us to come and worship with them. We accordingly hastened to the beach, to erect an altar to the true God, where heretofore idols only have been served. Our temple was the work of the hands of the Almighty. Its only pillars were those that support the foundations of the earth, and its canopy the broad arch of heaven. But we doubt whether a purer flame of devotion would have glowed in our bosoms, had we knelt before the Lord on pavements of marble, or addressed his throne from the midst of carving and gold. About three hundred and fifty persons had encircled the tent, pitched for the temporary accommodation of the queen, in a grove of kou trees near a brick building now used as a storehouse, but once the residence of the late king when he visited Maui. We have seldom witnessed a more orderly and attentive audience.

A portion of scripture was read from the Tahitian version by Taua, a Tahitian Christian, assistant missionary to Mr. Ellis, who is attached to the retinue of the queen in the capacity of private instructor and chaplain — after which other appropriate services were performed. The chiefs desired to have the services repeated in the afternoon; and the queen requested us not only to worship God with her thus on the Sabbath, but to attend prayers regularly with herself and daughter every morning at sunrise and every evening at sunset.

Monday, June 2. Our schools have to-day been commenced, one at the establishment of each of the chiefs in company with the queen, and one also at the house of Keoua, the governor, making six in number: that of Keopuolani and Hoapili, her husband; that of the princess Nahienaena; of the young queen Kekauonohi, a wife of Liholiho; of Wahinepio, the sister of Kalaimoku, and Kehikili her husband; of Kaiko and his wife Haaheo; and of the governor.

Our pupils consist of the chiefs and a few of their particular favorites. The rulers have, from the first arrival of the missionaries, opposed the instruction of the common people in reading and writing, saying, "If the pala-pala—letters—is good, we wish to possess it first ourselves; if it is bad, we do not intend our subjects to know the evil of it:" and thus far a kind of kabu has existed against any but religious teaching among the commoners. And the whole number of islanders who have learned, and are learning to read and write, does not amount to more than two or three hundred; about fifty of whom are now under our direction.

It may not be readily understood how we can teach in a tongue of which we are almost entirely ignorant. The rudiments of the language are so simple, that after once learning the sounds of the letters and diphthongs, there is no difficulty in pronouncing any word correctly, or in mechanically reading any sentence. So that we are fully competent to instruct in reading and spelling the few sheets in print, and in writing.

Several are learning the English language; but the combination of its sounds are so foreign to the genius of their own, and some of its letters so utterly beyond their powers of enunciation, that, as Kaahumanu says, they do indeed make "crooked work of it;" often exclaiming, in their attempts to acquire it, "ua like no i ka pohaku"—"it is just like a stone!"

Keopuolani is indefatigable in her efforts to learn to read in her own tongue. It is but a few months that she has been interested in the object of the mission; and being aged, she has great apprehensions that she may not live till, as she herself expresses it, she "has learned enough of the good word—of God—and of the right way to go" to Heaven." Her influence is so great that in this respect, and in every other, her example is very important. Her character has for some time been free from the reproaches of heathenism; and she appears sincerely desirous of fully imbibing the spirit, as well as of observing the forms of Christianity. Kalaimoku and Keoua dined with us to-day. While at the table, the prime minister informed us that Keopuolani had given us a plantation adjoining that of Mr. Butler; and directing the governor to put us in possession of it, by shewing the boundaries in the presence of its tenants, according to the custom of the country, he took his leave with a pleasant aloha, and the salutation, "much happiness to you all on the island of Maui."

We have since ascertained that the plantation is his own; and that it is to his liberality, probably with the knowledge of the queen, we are indebted for the kindness.

By the word plantation, as used here, you are not, my dear M——, to understand what its acceptation in America would convey, an estate of five hundred or five thousand acres; but an extent of land more contracted than your kitchen-garden at the Lake lands, consisting of a collection of kalo beds, interspersed here and there with a few rows of potatoes, a little sugar-cane, and some irregularly planted banana, and cocoanut, or bread-fruit trees.

Such are the limits and appearance of the ground given to us; the soil is, however, exceedingly rich, and may be formed into a beautiful garden.

Tuesday, 3. After evening prayers at the queen's, we took leave of Kalaimoku and his party, who shortly after went on board the barge, to return to Honolulu. Mr. Loomis also left us. The only object of Kalaimoku in visiting Lahaina, was to escort Keopuolani, who, being the highest chief by blood in the nation, receives every mark of honor and affection from the government and people. At this interview he appeared more kindly disposed than ever, repeatedly taking us by both hands, as a token of peculiar tenderness, and pressing them to his bosom. He told us that the queen would continue to provide for us as she had done. Our table has been bountifully furnished every day from her stores. This morning she said to William, our interpreter, "Have they hog still?" "Yes." "Any dog?" "No eat dog." "Any potatoes?" "No." "Any melon?" "No." On which an order was immediately given, and two men despatched to us heavily laden with potatoes and melons. Pigs, hogs, fowl, and goats, have been sent constantly by one person or another. No congregation in America could in this respect have received a clergyman, coming to administer the word of life to them, with greater hospitality, or stronger expressions of good-will.

Thursday, 5. Found leisure this morning to take a cursory survey of the settlement in which I am now a spiritual instructor. The first view of it from the sea and anchorage gives too favorable an impression of its beauty; and the appearance of great luxuriance which it exhibits does not expose the rude and imperfect cultivation of the natives.

Lahaina is situated on the north-west end of Maui, and lies between two points projecting slightly into the ocean; one on the north and the other on the south, about two miles distant from each other. These, in their respective directions, terminate the view of the beach.

The width of the district from the sea towards the mountain is from one half to three-quarters of a mile. The whole extent included within these boundaries is perfectly level and thickly covered with trees and various vegetation. The taste, skill, and industry of an American gardener might convert it into an earthly paradise; but now it everywhere appears only like the neglected grounds of a deserted plantation. There is no uniformity or neatness to be seen, and almost everything seems to be growing in the wildness of nature. The bread-fruit trees stand as thickly as those of an irregularly planted orchard, and beneath them are kalo patches and fish-ponds, twenty or thirty yards square, filled with stagnant water, and interspersed with clumps of the kapa tree, groves of the banana, rows of the sugar-cane, and bunches of the potato and melon. All these flourish exuberantly from the richness of the soil alone, with but little attention or labor from the hand of man.

It scarce ever rains, not oftener, we are told, than half a dozen times during the year ; and the land is watered entirely by conducting the streams, which rush from the mountains, by artificial courses, on every plantation. Each farmer has a right, established by custom, to the water every fifth day. The pathways, which are very narrow, are usually along the sides of these water trenches.

The number of inhabitants is about two thousand five hundred. Their houses are generally not more than eight or ten feet long, six or eight broad, and from four to six high, having one small hole for a door, which cannot be entered but by creeping, and is the only opening for the admission of light and air. They make little use of these dwellings, except to protect their food and clothing, and to sleep in during wet and cool weather ; and most generally eat, sleep, and live in the open air, under the shade of a kou, or bread-fruit tree.

The land begins to rise rather abruptly about three-fourths of a mile from the sea, and towers into lofty mountains, three rude elevations of which, immediately east of Lahaina, are judged to be four thousand five hundred, or five thousand feet, above the level of the ocean. From the first swell of the rising ground, almost to the summits of these mountains, there is nothing to be seen but the most dreary sterility and sunburnt vegetation, intersected by gloomy ravines and frightful precipices.

Every part of the island seen from Lahaina wears the same forbidding and desolate aspect ; and after passing either point, the eye is met only by a barren sand-beach, occasionally interrupted by heaps of black lava, to which the wild dashings of a heavy surf add double gloom.

So far as our observation extends, this description is characteristic of the whole islands. Instead of being the sunny and elysian fields which the imagination of many make them, they in fact are only vast heaps of rocks in the midst of this mighty ocean, with here and there, at long intervals, a rich and luxuriant valley and plain thronged with inhabitants. The outlines of the whole group are wild and romantic, and the thick and ever-verdant forests, which crown the heights of many of the mountains, give them a refreshing appearance. But to an eye accustomed to the varied beauties of an American landscape, to its widely cultivated fields, its stately groves, its spreading lawns, and broadly gleaming rivers, its gardens and enclosures, its farm-houses, country-seats, villages, domes and spires, a more melancholy place of exile could scarce be selected than the Sandwich Islands.

The islands of Lanai, Molokai, and Kahulawe, are in full view from Lahaina; the two former to the west and north, and the last to the south; and, at the distance of fifteen or twenty miles, are as dreary as the gloomiest imagination could paint them. Almost constantly enveloped in lowering clouds, they are as emphatically the dark mountains of the natural, as they are figuratively those of the intellectual and spiritual world. We here look in vain for those beauties in nature with which we once feasted our admiration to enthusiasm; for “Objects find we none,

Except before us stretched the toiling main,
And rocks and wilds in savage view behind.”

The south point of Lahaina, however, presents one subject of glorious meditation: the ruins of an Hei-au, or idolatrous temple. While wandering over this now confused heap of stones, I involuntarily shuddered at the thought that they had often been bathed in the blood of a human sacrifice: a fearful truth. But, O how joyful, how inexpressibly animating, the association now inseparably connected with it!—

“The altar and idol in dust overthrown,
The incense forbade, that was hallowed in blood;
The priest of Melchisedec here shall atone,
And the shrines of Lahaina be sacred to God!”

Yes—we confidently believe that the stifled shrieks of a devoted human victim will never again break on the midnight silence of these groves; and that the only sacrifice that will ever here be offered, will be that of “a broken and contrite heart,” which thou, O God, wilt not despise.

Saturday night, June 7. The first week of our residence at Lahaina is completed; and few missionaries have ever been more highly favored in forming a station, far from every abode of civilization and piety, than we have.

The Lord hath dealt kindly with us, by disposing the hearts of the queen and chiefs to the most friendly and generous attentions.

Our table has been constantly and bountifully spread by our benefactress, who, clothed with regal power, in this respect literally fulfills the promise, "Behold, I will lift up my hand to the gentiles, and set up my standard to the people, and kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and queens thy nursing mothers." Preparations are already made for the speedy erection of our dwelling-houses; and timber is collecting for a chapel and school-house, all by the liberality of the same interesting personage.

And where is the civilized heart that will refuse its warm approbation and zealous support to the attempts that are making for the benefit of those who appear so anxious to receive it? Who, after witnessing scenes which have become familiar to us, will say, "the heathen cannot be enlightened?" Who will assert that instruction to these is thrown away, when, morning, noon and night, they may be found, in groups of from ten to thirty persons, spelling and reading and writing; and, whether in their houses or in the grove, whether strolling on the beach, or, I might almost add, sporting in the surf, making their books and slates their inseparable companions?

If, after the shortest and most imperfect tuition, many are capable of composing neat and intelligent letters to each other, now almost daily passing from island to island, and from district to district; so far from judging them not susceptible of attainments in the common branches of education, we need not fear to encourage a belief that some may yet rejoice in the more abstruse researches of philosophy and science. They can be civilized — they can be made to partake, with millions of their fellow-beings, in all the advantages of letters and of the arts.

Nor is there more doubt that they may be converted to Christianity. They eagerly seek our religious instructions and prayers; and morning and evening, with seriousness and solemnity, surround the altar of the great I AM. The approach of the Sabbath is anxiously awaited; and so careful are they not to infringe its duties or defeat its object by unnecessary labors, that they prepare their food before its commencement with more punctilious care than many in our own country who are thought to observe it with superstitious particularity. We do not say this of the nation, for, alas! gross darkness covers the people, and thousands are everywhere perishing in the depths of ignorance and sin; but of those only who have received the most constant and direct influence of the mission. If it can be said, however, even of a few — and in its full extent it can be — who will not admit that all are alike capable of receiving and obeying the precepts of eternal life?

We thank God more warmly than ever, that of his good pleasure he excited within our bosoms the desire “to forsake houses, and brethren, and sisters, and father, and lands, for his sake, and for that of the gospel;” and that we have the prospect of living and dying beneath the dark mountains of Maui. If ignorance of the world and of our own hearts do not deceive us, we had rather hear the warm and constant “aloha,” “aloha nui,” “aloha nui roa,” “maikai, maikai,” — “love to you,” “great love to you,” “very great love to you,” “good, good,” — of the crowds of these ignorant and degraded immortals, with the cheering prospect of conferring on them blessings temporal and eternal, than to receive the loud huzzas of an American or European populace, shouting the plaudits of a hero or a monarch.

Wednesday, 18. A messenger from the queen came to our cottage very early this morning, desiring Mr. Richards and myself to go to the beach, to make a definite selection of a situation for the missionary establishment. On going down, we found the timber on the ground, and a large number of men, from a distant district, waiting for directions where to put it up. Keopuolani and the young princess both accompanied us to the site we had before partially chosen. It is a bank a few yards from the sea, elevated about six feet above the level of the water, and at present promises greater retirement than any spot in the section of the district in which the queen wishes us to reside. Its only advantage is a peculiarly fresh sea-breeze.

As soon as we expressed our preference for it, the men began digging holes for the corner posts, making each house twenty-three feet long, and fifteen feet wide, with a space of fifteen feet between them. The posts are about as thick as the arm of a man ; and after being fastened in the ground, are about five feet high. The whole number on each side of a house is seven. The tops are excavated, to admit a pole about an inch in diameter, which extends horizontally the whole length of the building, and to which the posts are all lashed with strings made from a small but strong vine.

The rafters are as numerous as the posts, and nearly as large, and are fastened to their tops with strings. The principal strength of this joint arises from an extension of the outside of the post, two or three inches above the larger and inner part, which is received into a corresponding notch made in the end of the rafters.

The upper ends of the rafters rest on and are lashed to a ridge-pole, supported at each end by a long post reaching from the ground to the peak of the roof. Between the corners and these middle posts there are others parallel to them, diminishing in length according to the inclination of the roof. These complete the frame of the building. The next business is to prepare a foundation for the thatch. This is done by lashing small round sticks, at intervals of five or six inches, horizontally, to the posts of the sides and ends, from the ground to the ridge-pole ; to these the thatch of grass is tied by strings made of the fibres of the cocoanut husk. In the best built houses, between the sticks and the grass there is an inner thatch, or lining, of the leaves of the sugar-cane or banana.

Our kind patroness remained on the ground till we ourselves left it for breakfast ; and constantly addressed us, and spoke of us to the people by the affectionate appellation of " sons."

The ship Dawn, of New-York, touched here on the Sabbath, and sailed again for Oahu. The same day the Boston, Capt. Joy, of Nantucket, arrived, and is still at anchor off Lahaina. After dining with us to-day, Capt. Joy took Mr. Richards and myself to his ship.

When returning, towards sunset, we observed an immense crowd of people in the grove, near the establishment of Keopuolani ; and hundreds of others hastening from every direction to the same spot. A hula-hula, or native dance, was performing in honor of the arrival of the queen and princess.

The dancers were two interesting girls, ten years of age. Their dresses were of beautiful yellow native cloth, arranged in thick folds and festoons from the waist to the knee; with wreaths of evergreen and wild flowers on their heads and necks, ornaments of ivory on their wrists, and a kind of buskin round the ancles, formed of dog's teeth, and loosely fastened to network of hemp so as to rattle like the castanet in the motions of the dance. The musicians were six men, seated on the ground with large calabashes before them, which they beat with short sticks. The sound of these, accompanied by that of their voices repeating the song, constituted the rude music. The girls occasionally joined in the song, and often were the only singers, continuing the subject in duet, and at times by a solo. The motions of the dance were slow and graceful, and, in this instance, free from indelicacy of action; and the song, or rather recitative, accompanied by much gesticulation, was dignified and harmonious in its numbers. The theme of the whole, was the character and praises of the queen and princess, who were compared to everything sublime in nature, and exalted as gods.

The chiefs, seated in front of the performers, were so intent on the exhibition, that we scarce expected to gain their attention. Keopuolani, however, ordered the performance to cease the moment the sun began to set; and commanding the crowd to be seated and keep silence while she worshipped God, beckoned us to come to her sofa; and we proceeded with the usual exercises. The number of persons present was not less than two thousand; to whom—and to many for the first time—the words of eternal life were proclaimed, and that Name made known, which is the only one, "under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved."

June 19. Hoapili, the husband of the queen, called at our cottage this afternoon, to request the acceptance of his name for our son C—; a mark of great friendship, and, in this case, of honor and condescension, according to the ideas of the islanders. An exchange of names between adults, is one of the strongest pledges of affection: and the conferring of his own name, by a high chief, whether on an individual in infancy, as in the present case, or in manhood, imparts a dignity here not surpassed by that of "the spur" or "garter" in more polished monarchies. The event was formally announced to the chiefs and the people at evening prayers, and a servant despatched with a very appropriate present for "the young Hoapili," — a large bucket full of arrowroot: an article spontaneous in its growth, prepared to some extent by the natives, and by them called pia.

June 20. In all external things, here, there is a sameness, morning, noon, and evening, day and night, that, accompanied as it necessarily is by an utter want of society, would prove insupportable, I should think, to every civilized and intelligent resident but a missionary. True, the weather is perpetual June; we have no rain, no storms, no lowering clouds, and all immediately around is perennial verdure; but there is a death-like silence and want of animation in everything; a stillness of desolation that drowns the spirits and destroys the elasticity both of body and mind. There is nothing to be seen or heard of those things which enliven the most retired situations in our own country; no chirping birds, no gamboling flocks, no lowing cattle. Even the few natives, who are at the same time at work on their small plantations, cause no interruption to the general silence; no sound of industry is created by the rude implements with which they cultivate the ground; and their labor is unaccompanied by anything like "the ploughboy's whistle," or "the reaper's song." In fine, little besides the shoutings of a midnight revel, intimates life, much less contentment and joy, among the dwellers of the land.

But our object, and our hopes, buoy us above the influence of this oppressive peculiarity, and impart a contentment and cheerfulness which often rise to undissembled joy. In contrast with this our chosen lot, fancy sometimes sketches scenes which might have been our own — in which "An elegant sufficiency, books, friendship, ease,"

“Useful life,
Progressive virtue, and approving Heaven.”

But I would not exchange my situation and prospects, with the temporal and eternal interests of this people, connected with them — slight as they may be — for all the earthly enjoyment the most fascinating of these could secure. Even while I cast a momentary glance at them, my better judgment tells me — and I doubt not tells me true — that the enchantment by which they are surrounded exists only in “the visions of romantic youth ;” and that any supposed addition to the happiness now in my possession, which the world could make, is but imaginary and deceitful. Little as I have ever experienced of the ills and disappointments of life, I know that were I to realize such scenes in their highest charms, of them I should be compelled at last to exclaim,

“Oh! what, in truth, is mortal pleasure but
The torrent’s smoothness, ere it dash below!”

Monday, June 23. The first humble temple for the worship of Him “who dwelleth between the cherubims,” ever founded between these dark mountains, has to-day been commenced. While we remarked the cheerfulness and animation with which the numerous natives engaged in the work, performed their task — though it has cost them already many days of hard labor in the mountains, and will detain them still many more from their families and plantations — while we heard one and another, on every side, saying to us as we passed, “Ke hale a ke Akua,” “ke pale pule,” “maikai,” “nui maikai,” — the house of God,” “the house of prayer,” “good,” “very good,” — our thoughts and our hopes hastened us through the spiritual darkness of the present time to that period of light and gladness, “when the Lord’s house shall be established on the tops of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it.”

Evening. A sail was descried this afternoon, in the channel between Lanai and Molokai. Soon afterwards, five guns fired in rapid succession — the private signal of Liholiho — announced the approach of his majesty. The brig came to an anchor just as we had finished evening worship with Keopuolani ; and Mr. Richards and myself accompanied Kekauonohi and Nahienaena to the beach, already thronged by the common people, to receive him. He landed in a small boat with a single chief, and saluted us in a polite and friendly manner. After embracing his queen and the princess, he took one under each arm, and hastened up the beach. The parting of the mother and son, when we left Honolulu, had interested us so much, that we felt desirous of witnessing their first interview after a month's separation. The chiefs had assembled, and were formally seated on their mats in a large circle, before the tent of Keopuolani, waiting the approach of their monarch. He entered the circle opposite to his mother, and where Wahine-pio, the sister of Kalaimoku, and mother of his youngest queen, was seated. Dropping on one knee, he saluted her ; on which she burst into tears ; and springing from her mat, led him to that of his mother. He knelt before her, gazed silently in her face for a moment, then pressed her to his bosom, and placing a hand on each cheek, kissed her twice in the most tender manner. The whole scene was quite affecting. I scarce ever witnessed an exhibition of natural affection where the feelings were apparently more lively and sincere. The king is a fine-looking man, and graceful in his manners ; while gazing on him, the queen's heart seemed to float in her eyes, and every feature told a mother's joy.

Tuesday, 24. On going to the beach as usual this morning at sunrise, we found every indication of a scene of revelry just ended. Liholiho had taken possession of his mother's establishment ; and, instead of the orderly and pleasant group which had uniformly before been waiting our arrival, we saw the ground everywhere strewn with the bodies of men and women, who evidently had sunk unconsciously to sleep, amid the vapors of the bottle. Several empty liquor-cases, of brandy, gin and rum, stood on a large mat in front of the tent in which the king was sleeping ; and bottles, drained of their contents, were dispersed widely around.

None of our former party, chiefs or people, were to be found. At eleven o'clock we repeated our visit ; but all was riot and debauchery ; and not meeting with any of our pupils, we quickly turned from so melancholy a scene of licentiousness and intoxication.

At sunset we again went to the beach. The wild and heathenish sounds of the song and the dance were distinctly to be heard long before we reached the place of our customary worship; and the tent of the king was still the centre of revelry.

On arriving near the crowd, Taua, the private chaplain of the queen, quickly approached us, saying he had been sent to await our arrival, and to inform us that Keopuolani would attend prayers at the residence of her daughter, to which she had removed. This was a pleasing message to us; and our satisfaction was greatly increased on entering the lanai of the princess, to find the whole of our pupils assembled — even Kekauonohi, the young queen.

Never can we forget the appearance of Keopuolani. The countenance and manner of no pious Christian mother could have manifested more real anguish of spirit in witnessing the dissipation of a beloved son. As we approached, her eyes filled with tears, and with a voice almost inarticulate from emotions ready to overpower her, she lifted her hand, and pointing to the scene of intemperance and debauchery, exclaimed, "Pupuka! pupuka!" "Shameful! oh shameful!" and throwing herself backward with a convulsive sob, hid her face and her tears in a roll of kapa, against which she was reclining.

Our hearts were deeply touched; and our spirits at once assumed an elasticity that caused them to rise to a height proportionable to the depression under which they had labored. With an excitement of hope never known before, we commenced the evening sacrifice. Taua seemed to partake deeply in our feelings, and exercised a spirit of prayer that would have elevated hearts far more insensible than ours were at the time. While he affectionately presented the queen herself before the throne of God, and fervently besought the outpourings of the Holy Spirit upon her, we could scarce resist the belief that the strong principles of moral rectitude which she had uniformly manifested, and which were then so strikingly displayed, were but the dawns of that light which would securely guide her immortal spirit to the realms of everlasting day: and touched with sympathy, as for a fellow child of God, we were constrained to mingle our tears with those of the parent, while he proceeded most humbly and importunately to supplicate the forgiveness, reformation, and eternal redemption, of her son. Before bidding her good night, she earnestly begged us to pray for the king; and on our replying that she must also pray for him, she said she constantly did, but that they both needed our prayers.

We afterwards learned that early in the morning she had reproved Liholiho for his habits of dissipation; warned him of the temporal and eternal consequences of them; and finding that he disregarded her advice, withdrew to the house of her daughter, where she was joined by the chiefs, except those he had brought with him.

Seeing how much his mother was devoted to her spelling book, and how deeply interested she was in all our instructions, the king, under the influence of his unhappy indulgences, said to her, "You study too much,—it is not good; you are old, and it is well for you to study a little only." To which Keopuolani replied, "True, I am indeed an old woman; soon I shall die: therefore I must learn soon, or I shall die before I obtain the good thing I desire." The king advised her to throw off all the restraints of our instructions, saying, "The missionaries are not good: they do not permit us to drink rum, nor to do anything we formerly did: their teachings are false and evil; their prayers are not good. Let us return to our former customs; let us now, as we formerly did, drink a little rum together." The queen answered, "Why do you call my teachers evil? They are good only, and great is my love for them. Good is their prayer, evil only has been ours. Did you not in former times tell me that the teachers were good, and beg me to regard their instructions, and cast away the customs of our old religion? So I have done; and I know that I have done well. Are not the missionaries the same, and their instructions the same? But now you disregard the new religion, and wish me to do so likewise; but I will not. I will never forsake my teachers. I will obey their word. Come you therefore with me; for never will I take my dark heart again!"

Two or three other chiefs, fond of dissipation, added their persuasions to that of the king, and said, "We have just discovered from the poe haoli,"—company of foreigners—"the thing that is right respecting the missionaries. Part of their teachings are true and good. It is well to attend to the palapala,"—reading and writing—"but there is no good in the pule,"—religion—"in the prayers and the preaching, and the Sabbaths. In India, we are told, they have the palapala; and are so rich that all the people in England and America go there for property; but they keep their stone and wooden gods still. It will be well for us, then, to secure the palapala, for it will make us rich; but let us cast off the pule,—it is of no use!"

From Tauga, Keopuolani quickly ascertained the true state of India, and replied, "The inhabitants of India are still pagans. They are in the darkness of heart which formerly was ours. If you wish, like them, to keep your black hearts, and to be heathen, and to live like the people of Satan, then live so,—cast off prayer and the Sabbath; and when you die, go and dwell with Satan in a world of misery: but leave me to myself, and trouble me no longer!"

Thursday, 26. This morning Keopuolani sent word to the king, that unless he reformed, "he would die and go to the fire," which had such an effect, that he has ceased to indulge to excess, and has commenced a course of medicine: his usual practice, when his better thoughts and resolutions gain a triumph over the power of temptation.

In passing his tent at eleven o'clock, H—— and myself called for a moment. He was tossing on his couch, groaning in all the horrors of a recovery from his debauch, and scarcely capable of saying, "aloha." Pauahi, the only one of his queens who has accompanied him from Oahu, was seated, a la turc, on the ground, with a large wooden tray in her lap. Upon this, a monstrous cuttle fish—sepia octopus, an animal of the molusca-vermes tribe—had just been placed fresh from the sea, and in all its life and vigor. The queen had taken it up with both hands, and brought its body to her mouth; and by a single application of her teeth, the black juices and blood, with which it was filled, gushed over her face and neck, while the long sucking arms of the fish, in the convulsive paroxysm of the operation, were twisting and writhing about her head, like the snaky hairs of a Medusa. Occupied as both hands and mouth were, she could only give us the salutation of a nod. It was the first time either of us had ever seen her majesty; and we soon took our departure, leaving her, as we found her, in the full enjoyment of the luxurious luncheon.

Friday, 27. The Cleopatra arrived this afternoon with the queens Kamehamalu and Kinau, and two or three hundred attendants on board.

Monday, 30. Reached the beach this evening just in time to witness an interesting sight, the presentation to the king of a tax levied on a district on the windward side of the island. The procession consisted of one hundred and fifty persons, led by the headman or overseer of the district. They were all neatly dressed in new kapa, and walked in single file; the first twenty men bearing each a baked pig or dog, ornamented with green leaves. These were followed by fifty others, carrying thirty immense calabashes of poe, twenty of which were suspended, each on a long pole, and carried by two men, and ten others on the shoulders of the same number of men. Then came females, to the number of seventy or eighty, each with a large package of kapa, or native cloth, on her shoulder. The whole was deposited in front of the royal tent, and the company, with hundreds who followed them, seated themselves in a circle at a respectful distance, apparently with the expectation that the king would present himself.

In the course of half an hour he left his tent, and paced the large mat in front of it for fifteen or twenty minutes. He appeared with dignity, and we could not but remark the similarity of his air and whole appearance to that of persons of rank in our own country, whom we have seen exhibit themselves in the same manner, to gratify the curiosity of the populace. He took not the least notice of the throng, and conversed with us as if there had been no persons present but ourselves.

July 1. Witnessed another triumph of the respect and attachment which the chiefs feel for the new system over former habits of folly and dissipation. On going to prayers, we found the whole court with an immense crowd of common people assembled at a dance. The collection was altogether the most numerous and noisy of any we had seen. The dancers were females, eighteen in number; the musicians, seven men. They continued to dance some minutes after we entered the circle, but when the usual period for prayers arrived, notwithstanding a manifest and most eager desire of the multitude for the continuance of the amusement, Kamehamalu beckoned to one of us to proceed to the lanai of the princess, and taking the arm of the other, was herself the first to break up the circle, and put an end to the dance. She was immediately followed by all the principal personages, the three other queens, the king, the princess, and chiefs, and by many of the natives. We seldom have so great attention as was given to the religious exercises that followed.

July 4. We were made happy by the arrival at Labaina this morning of our highly valued friend, Rev. Mr. Ellis. He came from Oahu in a schooner with queen-dowager Kalakua, and is on his way to Hawaii. The other gentlemen of the deputation have gone direct from Oahu.

Having heard an infant near us cry much during the day, and on making inquiry learned that it was sick, after tea this evening, accompanied by the ladies, I went to see it.

The disease was one of the eye; the inside of the lids were protruded on the cheeks, and swollen to the bigness of pigeons's eggs, while they throbbed almost to bursting with inflammation. The balls of both eyes were entirely hid. This had been the condition of the child for seven days, without an application of any kind, or even the least covering to protect the irritated organ from the light and wind, or from the flies which constantly lit on the almost excoriated surface. The hut of the parents could only be entered by stooping on our hands and knees, and was too small to contain more than two of us at the same time. They had no light, nor an article of any kind necessary to be used in attending to the infant. Their all consisted of the kapas they wore, the mats they slept on, and the calabashes from which they ate and drank.

This is by no means a solitary case of suffering, that has come to our knowledge. Within three days, two other infants have been brought to our yard, in most distressing situations; one with a shocking wound on its arm, from a cut by a broken bottle, and the other almost expiring with the croup. Both are already in a state of safety; and probably have been rescued from death by the prompt exertions of B——, who took them immediately under her care. Indeed, we seldom walk out without meeting many whose appearance of disease and misery is appalling, and some so remediless and disgusting that we are compelled to close our eyes against a sight that fills us with horror. Cases of opthalmia, scrofula, and elephantiasis, are very common.

Saturday, 5. The king and his queens, and many other chiefs, sailed for Molokai.

Monday, 7. All the public services of the Sabbath were performed by Mr. Ellis. His afternoon sermon led to a very serious and affecting conversation among the chiefs, on the subject of the eternal destiny of their ancestors and former heathen friends. The fate of the rebel chief, who fought and was slain, at the accession of the present king to the throne, in defence of idolatry and the kabu system, was particularly adverted to. They questioned whether he could possibly be in a state of happiness, since he died in the cause of the false gods; and also inquired whether the greater guilt of having worshipped idols was theirs, or that of their parents who had instructed them to do it. All agreed, however, in saying, that now they had received the true light, if they did not walk in it, their guilt would be much more aggravated than that of their forefathers, who had lived and died in heathen darkness.

On our way to attend public worship, we found several persons at work. Mr. Ellis inquired of one, "Whether Kalaimoku had not given orders to the people not to work on the Sabbath?" He replied, "He has, but I am working secretly, and Kalaimoku will not find it out." "That may be," said Mr. Ellis; "but there is a greater than Kalaimoku, the living and true God, who always knows what you are doing; and he can punish you, though Kalaimoku may not." "Well," answered the man, "he will not be angry with me for watering one bed more, and then I will stop."

Another, who had ceased to work at a wooden bowl, after speaking to him in the morning, we found with it again as we were returning home in the evening. On speaking to him a second time, he said he had "been to hear us pray, and thought he might go to work again." We replied No, and told him he must not work during the whole day. "Not work when the sun gets into the sea?" No, not till to-morrow: on which he with much good nature said, "Well, it is good — let it be so;" and put away his work.

Wednesday, 9. Mr. Ellis embarked this morning in the brig Ainoa, for Hawaii. I should have accompanied him but for an indisposition with which I have been affected for some days, and which has disqualified me for undertaking the fatigue and hardships of the tour.

Mission house at Lahaina, August 12. I have been ill for a month past; but within the last week have so far recovered as again to be engaged in the duties of the station. On the fifth instant, Mr. Bingham arrived from Oahu; and on the seventh, our families removed from the plantation of Mr. Butler to the mission houses prepared for us by Keopuolani on the beach.

These are of one size and one appearance, standing side by side with the ends towards the sea, and a few yards only from the beach. The doors are at the ends towards the ocean, the eaves being too low to allow of their being at the sides. A rude piazza of poles and the leaves of the sugar-cane extends in front from house to house, forming an open passage in which we are protected from the sun. The exterior of both buildings is precisely that of a long low hay-stack, such as is frequently seen in an American barn-yard.

Perhaps I can convey to you some idea of the interior of ours. On entering the door you have the whole house, in one apartment, before you; the sides, ends, and roof to its peak presenting the small unhewn timber of which it is constructed, in its original coat of bark, and lashed together by strings of mountain vine: and then the thatch of grass fastened to the sticks by ties of the same material. Its only floor is the ground, strewn with dried grass, and covered with mats of native manufacture. On the right of the door stands a pine cupboard, containing such table service as we have ; and on the left, a chest of the same material, with the provisions of the day. Near these articles, on either side of the house, and opposite to each other, are large flat-topped trunks, spread with cushions of our own make, and covered with the figured and variegated mats of the country, forming two settees, or divans, for which the thatch, against which they stand, makes very tolerable backs. Immediately adjoining each of these, are the portable writing-desks of H—— and myself, elevated on packing boxes covered with native cloth, and standing under square holes cut in the thatch, on each side of the hut, for windows, but unfurnished with sash or glass. A curtain of coarse check, drawn or undrawn at pleasure, here crosses the house, behind which, on the one side, is our bed, surrounded by curtains to keep off the wind, and surmounted by a kind of canopy of mats to defend it from the rain in wet weather, and from the lizards which harbor in the grass of the sides and roof, and not unfrequently fall upon us. Opposite this is a large packing box for a dressing table. The only remaining article is a book-case of unpainted deal, against the further end, containing my library ; with a window on one side, affording a view of the interior settlements and of the mountains behind, and a door on the other, the entrance to B——’s apartment.

Thus you perceive that our whole accommodations, huts, furniture, and I may add food, will compare in rudeness and simplicity with the meanest abode of cleanly and industrious poverty at home. We have succeeded in procuring boards for two tables, have two whole chairs, and one with a broken back : the fourth moveable seat, making the whole number belonging to the establishment, is of our own workmanship, a three-legged stool, such as that on which

And swayed the sceptre of his infant realms.”

To the same age belongs our little cabin of grass, with ground floor and unglazed windows ; but the poor thatch, through which, on every side, “ appears the broad glare of day,” is better suited to this region of perpetual sunshine, than it would be to latitudes where is nightly heard "the freezing blast" that "sweeps the bolted shutter."

I make these loopholes by which you may peep in upon us, not in a spirit of complaint, for I rejoice to assure you that days of happiness, bright as any I have ever yet known, have been spent by me on these distant shores; but that you may see that ours is no princely establishment, according to the calumnious reports of some, in which we dwell in luxury, and lay up treasures for our children, from the charities of the church.

Tuesday, 19. Ship Mentor, Capt. Newell, of Boston, from the north-west coast, touched on her way to Oahu. The Champion, Captain Preble, also of Boston, was at anchor here two or three weeks during my illness. From both we have received expressions of great kindness.

Thursday, 21. Descried a number of sail, in the early part of the day, approaching Lahaina from the leeward of Lanai; and judged them to be the Kauai fleet, bringing Kaahumanu and king Kaumualii, who were expected from Oahu. In the course of the afternoon, three brigs and two schooners anchored in the roads. They were exceedingly crowded with people, so much so, as to have not only the decks, but the chains, bowsprit, and tops, filled; and to cause the natives, as they passed our yard, constantly to exclaim, "pau loa mai!" "every body has come." We soon ascertained that a large number of the chiefs, besides Kaahumanu and Kaumualii, had arrived; Kalaimoku and suite, Naihe and Kapiolani, Laanui and Namahana, Auna the Tahitian chief, and his wife, &c. An incident occurred in the landing of the crowd, which will illustrate the amphibious habits of the islanders. Besides the boats of the vessels, several double canoes were engaged in transporting the people and their effects to the shore. These are formed of two single canoes of the same size, placed parallel to each other, at a distance of three or four feet, and lashed firmly together by transverse pieces of curved wood, making a flattened arch over the water between the canoes. Other pieces of wood are fastened longitudinally on this arch, constituting an elevated platform for the passengers and luggage, while those who paddle and steer occupy the bodies of the canoes at the sides. A boat of this construction left the schooner, anchored near a mile from the shore, with a heavy load, and had proceeded but a short distance before it filled with water and sunk to the surface. A shout of merriment, along the whole beach, first apprised us of the circumstance; and we reached the door in time only to see the passengers, chiefs and servants, male and female, plunging into the sea, and composedly striking for the shore with one hand, while with the other, each elevated above his head some article or package he did not wish to become wet.

Those who had the management of the canoe remained to free it from water, and to return it to the beach. This they did, by all placing their weight upon one end of it, by which means the opposite end was lifted into the air, and the water poured out; when, by a quick and dexterous return of themselves into the sea, the end elevated suddenly descended to a level again, and the whole canoe was partially relieved from her burden. By repeating this manœuvre two or three times, the greater part of the water was turned out, and the rest easily removed with a calabash.

Not unfrequently in making a passage from one island to another, their canoes become filled by the breaking of a sea; in which case they are in the same manner restored to a manageable condition: a part of the company swimming about with the luggage above water, while the rest prepare the boat for the continuance of the voyage.

Auna and Laanui took tea with us; after which, accompanied by Mr. Bingham, we called on the rest. They were partaking of a profuse supper of baked meats, soups, fish, poe, ship bread, and tea; and scattered along the beach, in temporary accommodations, surrounded by hundreds of the splendid torches of the kukui nut, made quite an imposing appearance. Kamehamalu was seated at her writing-desk in the open air, preparing a letter, by the light of the torches held by several servants, to be sent express to the king, now on the windward side of Maui, to inform him of the arrival of Kaahumanu and Kalaimoku. They were all in high spirits, and seemed greatly to enjoy the meeting which had taken place. Prayers were made at their particular request, with separate groups, in three different places, before we returned home.

The kukui tree — aleurites triloba — is very abundant on the mountains. Its leaves are large, of a very light green, the under surface almost white; and bearing large bunches of white flowers, the contrast afforded by it, with the dark green of other mountain growth, has a very pretty effect, both when viewed near and at a distance. The nut of this tree was the principal substitute for candles among the islanders before the introduction of oil by the whale ships. It is nearly as large as a Madeira nut, to which it bears some resemblance. It is full of a rich oil; and after being slightly baked, is formed into torches by stringing thirty or forty nuts together on a rush; and enclosing four or five of these strings in the leaves of the ki or hala. After being lighted, before one nut is consumed the flame communicates to the oil of that next below; as the flame expires, the shell of the exhausted nut is struck off, till the whole is consumed.

Sabbath, 24. Thinking it a favorable opportunity for opening the chapel, while Mr. Bingham and so many of the chiefs are with us, we had the house prepared yesterday, and gave notice that the public services of the Sabbath would be held in it. Mr. Bingham accordingly preached a dedicatory sermon; text, "This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of Heaven." Seldom have we seen any house filled with a more crowded and attentive audience. The chiefs appeared greatly interested in the sermon and exercises. May it prove the birthplace of many souls, and an entrance to Heaven through which multitudes shall be added to the ransomed of the Lord!

CHAPTER IX.

RESIDENCE IN MAUI.

Mission house, Lahaina, Sept. 2, 1823. Queen Keopulani has been unwell for some days. It is a custom among the chiefs to assemble at any place where one of their number of much importance is ill; the least indisposition of a very high chief will thus call the ke poe n' Alii, or company of chiefs, together. The illness of Keopuolani, though not supposed serious, has occasioned despatches to be sent by several native vessels, for the high chiefs on all the different islands.

Thursday, 4. When we rose this morning, three vessels, two schooners and a brig, were approaching Lahaina. Just after breakfast, one of the schooners came to anchor, and brought to us Mr. Ellis, on his return from the tour of Hawaii. The deputation have had a most interesting, but fatiguing journey; and a slight glance at the journal and drawings of Mr. Ellis, makes me regret more than ever the necessity that denied me the pleasure of accompanying him. The rest of the gentlemen have gone direct to Honolulu in the brig Becket. The other vessels were the Waverly and the Waterwitch, from Oahu, bringing the chiefs sent for by Keopuolani.

Shortly after these had landed, I went to the residence of the queen, and witnessed one of the most striking peculiarities in the customs of the islanders—that of wailing. There were not less than fifty chiefs around the couch of the queen, and twice that number of their attendants, all weeping aloud with an apparent sincerity and depth of feeling that could not be witnessed, considering the present occasion of it, without exciting sympathy in the spectator. The young Kahalaia, a nephew of the late king, was the only one of the number just arrived who entered the house after I did. He is one of the most stern and forbidding of the chiefs, but the general inflexibility of his character seemed to give way at the scene; and after kneeling and saluting the sufferer respectfully and tenderly, he struggled for a moment with a convulsive emotion, and then “lifted up his voice,” and wept in a manner that would have touched any heart.

To us these wailings appear extremely barbarous, though I doubt not they are precisely the expressions of sorrow made by the most refined and polished of the ancients; and I never witness them without being reminded of the mournings of the people of Israel, as spoken of in the scriptures. Shortly after I reached the house, Mr. Bingham and Mr. Ellis came in, when Kalaimoku immediately commanded silence, and requested that prayers might be made. I was affected with the propriety of the proposal, and have scarce ever before felt more interest in a hymn and prayer, with the natives, than in those which immediately followed.

While at dinner, Mr. Hunnewell, the first mate of the brig Thaddeus when she brought out the pioneers of the mission, and who has resided on the islands as a commercial agent ever since, came in quite ill; he is an amiable and highly respectable young man, and has become justly dear to the mission, from his unwavering friendship in the midst of much opposition. We were happy to have it in our power to secure to him a quiet room and bed, which he so greatly needed.

Saturday, 5. The Waterwitch, commanded by Mr. Hunnewell, left us for Oahu, to bring up Boki, on account of the increased illness of the queen. For the same reason the barge has sailed for Kailua, to bring governor Adams.

Monday, 8. The exercises in the chapel yesterday morning were conducted by Auna, the Tahitian chief, an assistant missionary to Mr. Ellis. He is a noble-looking man, a graceful speaker, and an enlightened and zealous Christian. In the afternoon I preached through Honolii as interpreter. This morning, the Ainoa, a native brig, arrived from Hawaii, bringing Mr. Harwood, a young American, who has resided some time with the mission family at Honolulu, and who accompanied the deputation on their tour through Hawaii.

Tuesday night. We were so much exposed to depredations by theft, that the queen sometime since appointed a trusty servant to take charge of our yard, as keeper and guard of the articles necessarily in daily use. This evening, while at tea, we were alarmed by the hasty entrance of this man, exclaiming, "Ua make loa Keopuolani,"—"Keopuolani is dead." After interrogating him, however, we found that she was only more ill, and would soon die. Mrs. Richards, H——, and myself, immediately hastened down, though dark and late. We found the house, which is very large, crowded with the chiefs, who had assembled from all their different abodes, and were seated, in silence and sadness, as near the queen as they could press. Her couch was surrounded by Hoapili her husband, the king and favorite queen, prince and princess, king Kaumualii, Kaahumanu, and Kalaimoku.

Many of these were bathed in tears. The queen seemed very feeble, and could scarce speak. She reached her hand to the ladies, however, whispering an affectionate "aloha," adding, "maikai, maikai," "good, good," in expression of gratitude for their coming out at night to see her. But what most delighted us was, the low, but expressive sentences which immediately followed, while she continued still to press their hands, — "Make make au i ke Akua," "I love God; and shortly again, — "Aloha ino iau i ke Akua," "Great indeed is my love to God!" She was too feeble to say more, but seemed in a state of mind to give much stronger testimony to the excellency and power, even in death, of the religion we had brought to her.

The cause of the sudden gloom and alarm was not any very material change in Keopuolani, but the opinion of Mr. Law, the king's surgeon, that she could not recover; and the declaration that he could be of no further use to her. The king asked me whether it would not be well for him to despatch a vessel immediately to Oahu for Dr. Blatchely, of the mission; to which I answered in the affirmative, being myself unwilling that any means of saving so valuable a life should remain untried. A pilot-boat sailed, in a few minutes, with Honolii, as the king's messenger, to bring Dr. Blatchely.

Wednesday morning, 10. At twelve o'clock last night I was awakened by the young Kahalai, with a message from Kalaimoku, that the queen was worse, and they wished me to come down. I found the whole company much agitated; and although Keopuolani had recovered from the spasm which caused them to send for me, I remained till daybreak with her. She had two or three attacks, which I thought she could not survive. She bears her sufferings with much fortitude and patience, however; scarce a sigh escaping her lips, while all around her are drowned in tears.

The chiefs are most assiduous and indefatigable in their attentions. None of them left her, or slept for a moment during the night; even the little prince and princess never closed their eyes. The kindness and attention of Kamehamalu is particularly observable; she watches every look and motion, and anticipates every wish. I have scarce ever had my feelings of sympathy more deeply touched than on seeing her and the king, and Hoapili, bending over the queen whenever she appeared to be in peculiar agony; their strong desire, yet inability, of rendering her any relief, was deeply expressed in their looks, and manifested itself in renewed bursts of tears.

It was a profitable night to my own mind; everything was calculated to confirm me in the importance of being prepared to meet and struggle with the king of terrors. I thought of the sufferings the Son of God endured for the salvation of sinners: and the lively view of them, connected with their necessity and their end, caused me to mingle my tears with those that were flowing from all around me: and my prayer was not only that this gentile, lately made acquainted with the knowledge of God, but that I also, nurtured and brought up in the admonition of the Lord, might be saved.

Thursday, 11. Yesterday and to-day the surf has been excessively heavy, and often by its beauty and sublimity has attracted our attention and admiration. But the dark wing of death has been over it, and its loveliness for a time is shrouded in gloom. At eleven o'clock this morning the long-boat of the brig Ainoa was overturned in attempting to land by the usual passage, and four white men narrowly escaped drowning, while a fifth sunk to rise no more alive. The report flying among the natives, Ke haoli make loa i ka nalu, "a foreigner is dead in the surf," collected a number of foreigners on the beach, by whom exertions were made to restore him to life, but without success. The spirit had fled through the foaming surges to the world of retribution! Mr. Butler humanely had the corpse removed to his enclosure, from whence in the evening, attended by most of the foreigners then at Lahaina, we bore it to a more decent grave than is the last abode of many an inhabitant of Christian lands whose destiny is to die among the heathen.

Friday, 12. The pilot-boat New-York arrived at noon with Dr. Blatcheley and Mr. Richards; the surf is still very high and dangerous, but they landed safely about two o'clock. Dr. Blatchely thinks the queen will not recover.

Governor Adams not having arrived, two additional vessels have been despatched for him.

Monday, 15. At midnight a messenger came for Dr. Blatchely to visit the queen. I accompanied him to see her. She was very ill, but the fear of God seemed to predominate over every other feeling. When a little wine and arrowroot were recommended to her, she desired that Auna, the Tahitian, might be called to speak "the good word, and to make a prayer." After she had taken the refreshment, she appeared more easy, and Auna, in compliance with her request, at the suggestion of the king, proceeded to address Keopuolani and those present on the subject of religion. He continued his remarks for half an hour, and concluded with a most spiritual and fervent prayer. This converted pagan is a correct and stable Christian. He was long a deacon in a church in his native island; and, I have no doubt, has been instrumental, under the blessing of God, of enlightening the mind of this dying chief unto salvation, through faith in Jesus Christ.

It was a profitable hour to my own spirit, though I could understand but little of what was said. I knew the subject, however, and saw that every word, and every look, and every gesture, sprung from an eloquence of soul that originated only in a lively sense of the reality and importance of the things of eternity.

Tuesday, 16. This has been an interesting and memorable day. Last night the Paragon, Capt. Coles, of Boston, from Oahu, anchored among the vessels now here. Mr. Hays, captain's clerk, landed at eleven o'clock, and informed us that Mr. and Mrs. Ellis and Mr. Ruggles were on board. They came on shore at eight o'clock this morning, and called immediately on the queen ; but finding her in a deep sleep, passed on to the mission house.

The arrival of Mr. Ellis was most opportune. The dying hour of our kind patroness and friend was evidently fast approaching ; and "hoping" as we do, "in her death," we were anxious that something further might be elicited from her conversation by one more familiar with the native language than ourselves, that would prove an encouragement to our hearts and a blessing to the immortals who with the deepest interest hung round her dying couch. After an hour, Mr. Ellis and myself again called to see her. She was still asleep. The king, Kaahumanu, and Kalaimoku, immediately and urgently requested that she might be baptized, saying that it was her earnest and special desire, and that she had only that morning begged "to be washed with water in the name of God." The king told Mr. Ellis, they did not wish her to be baptized because they thought she could not be saved without it, but because she was a Christian, had the true faith in her heart, had given herself to Jesus Christ long before she was sick, and because all the people of God were baptized, and she had herself so earnestly requested it. Mr. Ellis told them he would consult Mr. Richards and myself on the subject, and when she awoke, would converse with and baptize her.

The certainty of her death had spread universal alarm among the people. She was known to be the highest chief on the islands ; and, according to former and immemorial customs, the death of such has ever been attended with all kinds of extravagance, violence, and abomination. On such an occasion, every restraint was cast off, and all were in the habit of following the impulse of any and every wild passion that might seize them. Rights of person or of property were no longer regarded ; and he who had the greatest muscular powers, committed whatever depredation he chose, and injured any one he thought proper. Even the chiefs lost their ordinary preeminence, and could exert no influence of restraint on the excesses of their subjects. It was the time of redressing private wrongs, by committing violence on the property and person of an enemy ; and everything that any one possessed was liable to be taken from him. Their grief was expressed by the most shocking personal outrages, not only by tearing off their clothes entirely, but by knocking out their eyes and teeth with clubs and stones, and pulling out their hair, and by burning and cutting their flesh; while drunkenness, riot, and every species of debauchery, continued to be indulged in for days after the death of the deceased.

Reports of these usages, and intimations of the danger to which we should be exposed from them, were brought to us from every quarter, both by foreigners and natives. We felt very little apprehension, however; for we were confident that ourselves and families would be inviolate, however great the excesses among the natives might be.

About four o'clock, while on the way with Mr. Ellis and Dr. Blatchely, a third time to the queen's residence, I met Mr. Jones, the American consul, who arrived this morning in the Paragon, with one or two other gentlemen, and we returned to the mission house. The conversation soon turned on the anticipated scenes of violence; the gentlemen seemed fully persuaded that there was great cause for apprehension, and were just offering their boats and ship, as a refuge for the ladies in case of extremity, when Richard Kalaïoula rushed in, in breathless terror, exclaiming, "The queen is dead!" We immediately snatched our hats, and were involuntarily hastening down the beach, when, observing the natives flying by hundreds in every direction, through fish-ponds and kalo patches, over walls and fences, apparently in a state of half distraction, bearing with them calabashes, kapas, and whatever of their property they had caught up in their flight — while the whole heavens rung with lamentations and woe — I returned without delay to our enclosure, fearing an alarm to the females, who were alone.

In a few minutes, Mr. Ruggles also came up, confirming the statement of her death, and adding that great excesses had already commenced. Just afterwards, however, while the confusion and alarm seemed everywhere to increase, Mr. Ellis came running to the house, with the information that she was not dead — had only fainted — had revived again — and that the chiefs were importuning him, in the strongest terms, to baptize her immediately. We all went down. The orders of the king and Kalaimoku had restored quietness, to a degree ; and we found our friend so far revived as to breathe regularly, and yet not so much so as to speak intelligibly. An interested and interesting group of foreigners, missionaries, and merchants, and chiefs, near relatives and friends, surrounded the dying pillow, and waited a few moments, hoping that the fluttering spirit might still be roused entirely from its lethargy ere it quitted its earthly tenement forever. But there being little prospect of this, Mr. Ellis proceeded at length to administer the sacred ordinance which entitles all who receive it to the name of Christian. It was a most impressive moment and a most solemn place ; and our prayer was, that it might be none other than "the house of God and the gate of Heaven," to the immortal soul hovering on the borders of eternity.

Thus the highest chief of the Sandwich islands, after having given satisfactory evidence of a renewed heart, and of sincere love to Jesus Christ, was initiated into the visible church of God ; and, in the course of an hour after, as we hope and believe, joined the invisible church above, having triumphed over the power of death and the grave.

It was not without good and abundant reason, that we entertain this belief. It is but a year since Keopuolani began to manifest much interest in the object of the missionaries, or to pay much attention to their instructions ; but since that time, the evidences that her heart was deeply touched by the power of grace, have been decisive, and in many instances truly affecting. The rejection of every practice which she discovered to be inconsistent with the principles of Christianity, an irreproachable external deportment, a cheerful and rigid compliance with every observance of our religion, the habit of constant secret prayer, of regular family worship with her household, and strong attachment to the services of the day of God, her proclamations amongst the people against their former vices, and her rebuke of sin when detected ; all confirmed us in a belief of the sincerity of her attachment to Christianity, expressed in her daily conversations.

For months, at least, the predominating thoughts and feelings of her mind and heart appear to have been those connected with the eternal destiny of the soul. Long before coming to Lahaina, she said to Taua, her private chaplain, when conversing with him on the subject of religion: "Great is the fear of my heart, that I shall never become one of the people of Jesus Christ: I have followed the customs of my country, and have been of the company of dark hearts; my thought is, that I shall soon die: and great is my sorrow, that the teachers of the good way did not come to us in the days of our childhood!" And afterwards—"I know their word to be true; good indeed is the word of God; and now I have found a Saviour and a good King, Jesus Christ, the Lord.

We have been informed by Taua, that since her establishment at Lahaina, messengers have arrived for him at midnight, to come and pray for her. On going to her residence, he has found her, with a few attendants, waiting his arrival: as he entered, she on one occasion said, "I am sorry to call you from your rest; but my thoughts are upon God, and I cannot sleep. I am old, soon I shall die, and great is my fear that I shall not know enough of the right way to go to Heaven. Speak to me of the good word of God that my dark mind may be enlightened." He has thus spent hours at a time, in conversing and praying with her and her immediate attendants, while all the rest of Lahaina has been wrapt in sleep.

After praying with her on one of these occasions, she said, "Now tell me something of Jesus." In complying with this request, he made choice of the last scenes in our Saviour's life: the trial before Pilate, the condemnation and crucifixion. He spoke of the scourging and crowning with thorns, and of the leading away to execution; but when he came to describe the nailing of the body by the hands and feet to the cross, she burst into tears, and exclaimed, "Oh! stop—I can hear no more; I and all my people, like the murderers of Jesus, are wicked and cruel!"

One morning, as I approached the grove in which she resided, to attend the customary worship of her household, I observed her seated on a sofa, with one of her hands pressed upon her bosom, apparently absorbed in deep and painful thought. On arriving near, I heard her voice in an under tone, and caught the words, "Ke ahi! ke ahi aole pio! ke ahi a a loa!—"Fire: inextinguishable fire: everlasting fire!" to which were added the exclamations, "Oh the sorrows of the wicked! they will cry for water, O, yes, they will cry for water! but there will be none: no, none at all—not even a drop for the end of their tongues!"—a train of thought, which, as I afterwards discovered, had been induced by meditations on the darkness of her own life, and fears of the just punishment of sin.

From the time her illness assumed an alarming aspect, she was unceasing, so far as her strength allowed, in her Christian counsels and exhortations to the chiefs, individually and collectively. When Kalaimoku arrived from Oahu, she said to him, "Great is the love of my heart for the good word of God, by which my mind has been enlightened. The word of God is true; it is a good word, and Jehovah is a God of goodness. Great is my love for him; great is my love for Jesus Christ, his Son. I have no desire for the former gods of Hawaii—they are false. My desire is unto Jesus Christ; and I have given myself unto him. My thoughts are much upon my grandfather Kalaiope, my father Kauikeaouli, and my husband Kamehameha; they lived not to see these good times, and to hear of the salvation of Jesus Christ. They knew not Jehovah, the true God. They died trusting to the false gods. I exceedingly mourn and lament that they saw not these good times of salvation! Do not you neglect to pray to God; cease not to regard the Sabbath; commit no sin; and love Jesus Christ, that we two may meet in Heaven."

Her conversations with other chiefs of rank were of a similar character. She addressed the king in the following manner: "I am now about to die; I shall soon leave my children and my people, and these lands; and I wish now to give you my last charge;" and after recommending to him a mild and kind government of his subjects, added—"Protect the missionaries, and treat them kindly. Walk in the straight path which they point out to you. Regard the Sabbath,—serve God,—love Jesus Christ,—and attend to all the good word; follow not the example of the evil, when your mother is gone, but follow that of the good, that we may meet in Heaven."

She expressed great solicitude for the prince and princess; and repeatedly commended them to the care of the chiefs, especially in reference to their morals, and to the instructions of the mission.

This morning, before she fell into the stupor, Auna and Taaia approached her couch, and asked what her thoughts were. She replied, "I remember the word of my teachers. I pray greatly to Jesus Christ to receive me. I am about to die; but it is not dark now, as it would have been had I died in former days. Pray for me; let all the missionaries pray for me. Great is my love to them, great is my love to you. My thought is, that I love Jesus Christ, and that he will receive me to his right hand. Great is my desire to be washed with water, in the name of God, before I die. I have given myself to Jesus Christ: I am his; and I wish to be like his people!"

Mr. Ruggles informed us that when a son of Kaumualii died at Kauai, the missionary houses were guarded by sixty armed men, till after the burial of the body; and suggested the propriety of requesting a guard on the present occasion. Mr. Ellis accordingly spoke to Kalaimoku on the subject. He answered that there was not the least necessity for it; that we need not entertain any apprehension whatever; that Keopuolani had long before forbidden every heathen practice at her death; and that the people had received the strictest orders against all their former customs, except wailing.

Wednesday, 17. At nine o'clock last night, we went to hold prayers with the mourners. Instead of the anticipated confusion and riot, we found all still and orderly along the beach; except here and there a group, and a very large assemblage near the residence of the queen, who lifted up their voices and wept aloud. All that we saw excited our sympathy, rather than any horror or disgust. The nearest relations were still beside the corpse, and presented an affecting spectacle; especially the little prince and princess, who appeared entirely inconsolable. Hoapili, with one of these on each arm, pressed me also to his bosom, exclaiming, "Keopuolani, our friend, is gone to Heaven ; and we, alas, are left alone."

Prayers were held with them this morning also ; when the royal family, for the first time, made their appearance before the multitude collected round the house of death. They were greeted with the loudest expressions of grief ; and, though unaccompanied with personal violence, the scene was really frightful. I could plainly see how the enthusiasm, to which the people wrought themselves, might be heightened to a frenzy that would know no law. The king and Kalaimoku were convulsed with weeping, but did not, like rest of the family, wail after the manner of the heathen.

During the whole day, while preparations for the funeral were making, everything exhibited signs of wo. The whole district sent forth one uninterrupted sound of lamentation ; while large companies, from different settlements, were covering the beach in sad procession, and rending the heavens with their cries. Minute-guns have been fired since daybreak, and all the vessels at anchor, fifteen in number, have their yards canted, and wear their colors at half-mast.

Many things that I have witnessed, have again called to my mind the ancient customs of the Jews in times of affliction, not only the "lifting up of the voice," and weeping aloud, but "the rending of the garment," "the clothing in sackcloth," "and sitting in dust and ashes." Here, all disfigure themselves by the coarsest, and most ragged and filthy attire of old mats and kapa ; while in many cases their heads are covered with dust and sand.

On meeting any high chief, they prostrate themselves on the ground, and redouble every expression of grief. I never witnessed such a scene as took place on the arrival of governor Adams, this afternoon ; especially when the high chiefs and mourners came from the house in which the corpse lay, to meet him. I was near the governor, at the time surrounded by not less than five thousand of the natives, who seemed to become absolutely frantic, and ready to fall into any act of desperation that might cross their minds. Their wailings were indescribable to one not present; and the noise so overwhelming, that the minute-guns could scarce be heard through the din.

The word which they pronounce in wailing, is "au-we!" "au-we!" "alas! alas!"—prolonging the sound of the last syllable, sometimes for many minutes, with a trembling and agitated shaking of the voice. The tones in which it is uttered by different persons, vary from the lowest to the highest key, and from that which is most plaintive, to that which is most shrill. There being no uniformity in the time of beginning or ending the word, the confusion and discord thus created is terrific. The attitudes of figure are as various as the tones of voice. Some stand upright, casting their arms and faces towards heaven, with the eyes closed and mouth widely distended. Others, instead of throwing their arms upward, clasp their hands and place them behind their heads. Some bend forward, their faces almost to the ground, and their hands placed against their knees, or violently pressed into their sides, as if in excruciating internal agony; others clench their hands into the hair on each side of their heads, as if to tear it out by the roots; and all seem to emulate one another in attempts at the most hideous grimaces and painful distortions, while torrents of tears flow from their heads to their feet.

The governor and chiefs, after approaching within eight or ten yards of each other, stood at least fifteen minutes wailing in this manner with the multitude around them, before they embraced, and entered the house.

Thursday, 18. Everything being in readiness for the funeral of our departed friend, she was, at two o'clock to-day, deposited in a substantial mud-and-stone house, lately built by the princess. This is the first Christian funeral of a high chief that has ever taken place in the islands; and will probably be a precedent for all future burials among the heads of the nation. How different the rites of her sepulture from those of her fathers! They, since time unknown, have been dissected in secret by their nearest friends; their flesh has been burned and cast into the sea, with many idolatrous observances; and their bones carefully preserved and worshipped; while she calmly awaits the resurrection in the decent habiliments of a Christian's tomb. So anxious was Keopuolani on this subject, that, when in perfect health, she charged the king to allow of none of the former practices at her death; stating, that they all belonged to the time of "dark hearts; that she had lived to see the light; had cast off all their former customs; had surrendered herself to Jesus Christ; and wished her body to be given to his people — the missionaries — to be buried according to their direction, and wherever they might think best.

In consequence of this charge, Mr. Ellis had the arrangement of the funeral, which was conducted with the greatest order and propriety. The concourse of people was very great, amounting to many thousands; but there was no greater irregularity or disturbance than there would have been among the same number in a Christian land, on a similar occasion. The bell rang at twelve o'clock for the commencement of the religious exercises, which were held in a grove of trees near the queen's residence, the chapel being too small even for the chiefs. We all attended in mourning; and after a hymn, prayer, and sermon, by Mr. Ellis, the procession, led by the American consul, was formed. The mission family walked next to the foreigners, who, to the number of thirty or forty, followed Mr. Jones. Next came the household attendants and favorite servants of Keopuolani, headed by her own steward and that of her daughter; then the corpse, covered with a rich pall, the bearers of which were the five queens of Liholiho and the wife of Boki—a daughter of Hoapili—each carrying a beautiful black kahile; then the nearest relatives and highest chiefs, followed by a procession of at least six or seven hundred persons, principally chiefs of various ranks, with their favorites and friends.

All in the procession were dressed in the European style, and generally in black, with appropriate badges of mourning. Among the attendants of the chiefs, there were a few scarlet and yellow feather mantles and capes; and a considerable company of females dressed in scarlet paus, trimmed with black, with black shawls, closed the procession. The bell tolled, and minute-guns continued to be fired until the body was deposited in the place appointed for it. The relatives and high chiefs encamped immediately around the house, and are now busily engaged in erecting temporary booths, designing to live near the body for some time to come.

It is a great joy to us, to have the dust of one so justly dear committed thus decently and honorably to the tomb. Such a funeral, one that would have appeared respectable even in a Christian country, is a great triumph over the deep-rooted superstitions and abominations of this nation on such occasions; and deserves to be recorded as a remarkable epoch in the mission. I am persuaded it has given a death-blow, among the chiefs, to their former burial rites and ceremonies. It is viewed in this light both by natives and foreigners, inimical to our influence. Such have openly spoken of it as a triumph which they would most gladly have defeated, and which has roused much of their hatred and abuse. Some of the chiefs most favorable to the innovation, have suffered much ridicule and sarcasm for abandoning the customs of their fathers, and adopting the ceremonies of foreign nations. One, who is of a character to exult in the riot and debauchery of former times, and who looks on the restraints of civilization and piety with a malicious jealousy, ever since the death of the queen, has addressed a serious and dignified compeer, either in ignorant or willful blasphemy, by the word "Jehovah." Such, however, is far from being the feeling of any one of much consequence or authority; and only to-day, after the crowd had dispersed, Kalaimoku was heard to say, as he took his seat by the king, "What fools we have been, to burn our dead and cast them into the sea; when we might thus have committed their bodies to the tomb, and have had the satisfaction of still dwelling near them.

Sabbath, 21. Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, Mr. Ruggles, and Dr. Blatchely, with all the Tahitian and most of the Hawaiian church members, being at Lahaina, we felt desirous of improving their visit by the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Accordingly that ordinance was observed to-day. We were happy to have so large a number to join us in exhibiting, for the first time on the island of Maui, the symbols of that "broken body" and "shed blood," through which only there is remission of sin and acceptance with God. The house was crowded, many of the chiefs and natives being present, besides a considerable number of our own countrymen, who, though born and brought up "under the droppings of the sanctuary," still, during the solemn feast, stood afar off "in the court of the gentiles," thus confessing that they had no better "part nor lot in this matter" than the heathen by whom they were surrounded. If ever I have felt pain of heart since I came to the islands, it has been in seeing those who are comparatively "the children of light," sojourning of choice in Me-sech, and dwelling at ease in these tents of Kedar, "having no hope, and without God in the world."

Wednesday, 24. The whole district, men, women and children, to the number of some thousands, have been daily engaged this week in carrying stones from the old hei-ou, or idolatrous temple, on the south point, to the place where Keopuolani is buried, to build a monumental wall around the house in which she is deposited. Headed and assisted by their chiefs, male and female, of every rank, they have engaged in the work with much spirit, and pass and repass our door in troops of a hundred and more at a time, singing their rude songs with as much merriment, as with bitterness last week they seemed to wail.

In their feelings they are like children, subject to sudden and violent excitements, and easily diverted by an opposite cause to a corresponding extreme, whether of grief or joy. The nearest relatives of the queen, except her husband and the king, Kaahumanu, and Kaumualii, are engaged in this servile work, and themselves each erect her monument, with as much merriment as they would form a festal bower. The high chiefs engage personally in work of this kind, to evince their respect for the deceased, and to encourage their people in the labor. They are all followed by their kahiles; and I have smiled more than once to see a queen or princess royal carrying a large stone, while a stout man, behind her, has borne nothing but a light feathered staff, to proclaim the dignity of his mistress.

Ten o'clock, P. M. Scarce ever were my feelings more deeply wounded, than they have been this evening. During the fortnight of Keopuolani's illness, the king was perfectly sober. His heart seemed touched by the exhortations of his mother, and open to the persuasions of the missionaries, to forsake every evil habit, and seek the favor of God. His sensibilities were greatly excited by her baptism, death, and burial; and he resolved to abandon the habit of intemperate drinking. Apprized of this, some of the foreigners here present determined to achieve a triumph over the mission, as they considered it, by the defeat of an object so desirable and so important.

With this view, two or three successive dinner parties were made by them, one on the Sabbath, which Liholiho was importunately urged to attend; but anticipating the design, he perseveringly declined. Other attempts were made to draw him into their company, but all proved unsuccessful until this morning, when he was induced to visit one of the ships, under the pretence, on the part of his seducers, as we are informed, of shewing some remarkably beautiful specimens of goods. After being some time on board, refreshments of various kinds, and liquors, were served; but of the last, the king refused to partake. A bottle of choice cherry brandy was then produced, as a liqueur incapable of intoxicating, and which, having never seen before, he was led to taste, and to taste again, until he requested a bottle of it to take on shore,—a favor quickly granted. The result has been, that as Mr. Ellis and myself went down the beach at sunset, we saw the king seated in front of his tent under the full excitement of strong drink; Pauahi, in a disgusting state of drunkenness, by his side; a woman in a similar condition, and almost naked, dancing and singing before them; and twenty or thirty others, of both sexes, with cases of gin and rum at hand, beginning a dreadful revel.

As we approached the circle, Liholiho immediately said to us, in a kind and self-condemning tone, "Why do you come here?" To which Mr. Ellis replied, "We have come to express our sorrow for the sad condition you are in, and to reprove these, your guilty people, for encouraging you to destroy yourself, both body and soul:" upon which he dismissed us with the answer, "You are good men, you are my friends, but, eia no ke wahi o debelo!"—this is the place of the devil—"and it is well for you not to stay here !" The individual who has been thus successful in his end, has since boasted, not only that he has made the king drunk, but that he will keep him so, if he is obliged to send a vessel to Oahu expressly for more cherry brandy for the purpose !

But the sorrow of the evening did not rest here. At the request of the chiefs, we have attended prayers with them at the establishment of Kaahumanu, every evening about eight o'clock. On going down for this purpose to-night, we saw a considerable collection of persons gathered round governor Adams, as he was seated in the open air, surrounded by servants with torches. The bright glare of these presented the party in strong light to us, while we ourselves were shrouded by it in double darkness. In front of the governor was one foreigner upon his knees, making a mimic prayer, in imitation of a missionary ; while another was writing, in large letters on a slate, and presenting to him for perusal some of the basest words in our language ! As may be supposed, the recognition of our presence threw the company into some confusion ; and one person hastily brushed his hand over the slate, but not until the indignant eye of Mr. Ellis fully told a knowledge of its contents.

Friday, 26. Since the exposures at night, which I underwent during the sickness of Keopuolani, I have been quite indisposed. A change of air may be beneficial, and as there is much important and interesting business before the mission at Honolulu, I have been persuaded to accompany Mr. Ruggles and Mr. Hunnewell, this afternoon, to Oahu, in the Waterwitch.

Tuesday, October 28. I sailed for Oahu on the expected evening, now more than a month ago, and after a passage of nine hours, was at the mouth of the harbor of Honolulu, which we entered at sunrise. No opportunity to return occurred until last Saturday, when the young prince came up with about seventy of his attendants, in a small pilot-boat. I never suffered more, than on this passage of forty-eight hours, being exposed during the night to very heavy rains, and during the day to a burning sun, from which I could find no retreat. I did not leave the deck for a moment ; for though a part of the small cabin and a berth were assigned to me, and reserved for my use during the whole time, the crowd and heat below were so intolerable that I preferred lying in the rain and water on deck to enduring them, even when the showers were most heavy and sun most powerful. At five o'clock last evening, the captain of a whale ship recruiting here, kindly took me in a boat from the schooner, before she had come to anchor, and brought me to my rustic but neat and happy cabin.

Nothing of particular moment occurred while I was at Oahu. It is the season at which the whale ships visit the islands, on their way from Japan to the American coast, and I had the pleasure of seeing the captains and officers of nearly thirty ships in that business. The harbor looked quite like a busy port; besides the whale ships, there were several merchantmen there, some discharging their cargoes, just arrived from Canton, others from the north-west coast, and from the United States; some taking in sandal-wood for China, while others, hove down, were stopping leaks, &c. Two small vessels also were on the stocks, building, to sell to the government.

The distribution of the missionaries to the several stations took place before I returned, and arrangements were happily made for occupying two new stations — Kailua and Waiakea — on the island of Hawaii.

Mr. and Mrs. Thurston sailed from Oahu the evening before I did, for Kailua. The brig in which they were, anchored here during the night; and we had the happiness of receiving and welcoming them at our establishment to breakfast this morning, after the severe trial of a voyage of four days in a dirty, crowded native vessel: trial, I say, for I have known none equal to that of the voyage I last made, since I have been a missionary. A gale in the gulf stream, or passage round Cape Horn, in a decent vessel, in point of comfort and enjoyment, is not to be compared with it.

The most important event at Lahaina, during my absence, was the marriage of our friend Hoapili, the husband of Keopuolani, to Kalakua, one of the queens-dowager, mother of Kamehamalu, the favorite wife of Liholiho. I received the information of it in a letter before I left Oahu, in which it is said, "Hoapili was this day joined in holy wedlock to Kalakua; they were married in the chapel, by Mr. Richards. A large audience attended: the ceremony was solemn, and would have honored any land." This is a most happy innovation on the former habits of the people; it is the first Christian marriage ever known among the chiefs, and the second ever solemnized at the islands. Like the funeral of our late patroness, it will stand as a precedent, which I doubt not all friendly to the mission will readily acknowledge and be anxious to imitate.

Polygamy is an evil that will probably be among the last eradicated from the nation; but whatever has the least tendency towards its abolition, is desirable and gratifying. Had Hoapili followed the ordinary custom on such occasions, immediately after the burial of Keopuolani, or even before, he would have taken one, two, or more wives, without any form or ceremony; and, in fact, she was scarce deposited in her tomb, before there were five candidates for his hand, from among the highest females in the nation, he being one of the most wealthy and respectable of the chiefs. But he at once declared that he designed to follow the practice among Christians, of deferring his marriage for some time, and then taking one wife only, being married to her publicly in the house of God. This was also the wish of Kalaimoku, which of course was earnestly recommended by the mission, and has happily been accomplished. Both parties were fully instructed, by Mr. Richards, in the reciprocal obligations of the marriage contract, as understood and entered into by the members of Christian churches. Thus, my dear M——, are we enabled to take courage in our labor of enlightening and christianizing this people; hoping for a bright day of glory, and rejoicing even in this, "the day of small things."

Six or eight ships have touched here for refreshments, and two yet remain. Many of the officers and men were kind in their attentions to the mission family; and some of them appeared to be of the number who love and serve God. It is a joy indeed, to meet, in this land of pollution and sin, those who exhibit the light, the purity, the blessedness of the Christian character. O that every wanderer "o'er the mountain wave," and every "dweller on the deep," might speedily become a light and a blessing to the dark places of the earth !

Monday, November 30. Mr. and Mrs. Thurston remained with us one week, and then left us in fine spirits, to take their station and unfurl the banner of the cross on the rocky shores of Hawaii. I admired the spirit with which Mrs. Thurston, after bidding us farewell, sprang into a rude canoe with her two children ; and I watched them with a glass with lively interest, as they were paddled through the breakers to the open sea. No preparation appearing to have been made on board the brig, to hoist her on deck in a chair, which is usually done, she intrepidly mounted the ship's quarter by the manropes, and stood ready to wave us a distant farewell, before many others of the same refinement could have determined even to attempt ascending to the quarter-deck as she had done.

A few days afterwards, the brig Arab, Capt. Meek, of Boston, from Oahu, paid us a visit of a day, and then passed on to Kailua, where the king had gone in the Princess Mary, an English whale ship. The Arab returned in about a week, bringing Liholiho and his train, when it first began to be stated that he would speedily embark for Great Britain. In a few days a grand council of the chiefs was called at this place on the subject ; when we had the pleasure of again entertaining our beloved friends, Messrs. Bingham and Ellis, who had been requested by the heads of government to attend the meeting, and who arrived in the whale ship L'Aigle.

It was soon determined that the king should embark for England in the L'Aigle, Capt. Starbuck. Kamehamalu, governor Boki and Liliha his wife, Kapihe and Kekua-naoa, are to accompany him, with Manuia his steward, and a few male servants.

The whole body of chiefs, together with the king, was most earnest in their desires for Mr. Ellis and his family to accompany the party, and offered a large sum for his passage : at one time they even made his going a sine qua non ; and determined, in case Capt. Starbuck would not accommodate him, that the king's barge should be fitted up for the expedition. Mr. Ellis himself was desirous of making the voyage, principally on account of the very critical state of the health of Mrs. Ellis; but Capt. Starbuck declaring that he could not possibly take him, the king and chiefs were obliged to assent to his remaining. We all regretted this, for we wished the king to have had the benefit, during his absence, of so wise and in every respect competent a counsellor; but most especially from a regard to the welfare and happiness of Mrs. Ellis and her family. We fear she cannot long survive, without some change of the kind; and desired that after eight years of missionary toil and suffering, she might be restored to the bosom of her country and her friends; though the loss of Mr. Ellis's services at this time would be most sensibly felt by the mission in all its branches.

The king embarked from this place on board the L'Aigle on the eighteenth instant. At the time, and for two days before, we were almost stunned with salutes from the squadron at anchor before our door. He left us with no inconsiderable display of the "pomp and circumstance" of royal embarkation. Signals for sailing were made from the L'Aigle early in the day, in which she was followed by all the vessels, ten or a dozen in number — excepting the American brigs Arab and Owhyhee, and one or two small schooners; but all waited till the L'Aigle should lead the way, which was not till near sunset. As soon as she had well cleared her moorings, the whole squadron was in motion, and, with a fine breeze, "filled away" beautifully, amidst columns of smoke and fire, and a roar of cannon, that the waters and mountains of Maui probably never before heard.

We have just learned that the king left Oahu on Thursday last, the 27th. We are happy that he has actually undertaken the visit, and believe it cannot fail of benefiting himself and nation. We think the party a good specimen of the chiefs: Boki is an amiable man, though far inferior in talent and character to his brother Kalaimoku; and Kamehamalu, one of the most noble and interesting of the nation.

CHAPTER X.

RESIDENCE IN MAUI.

Mission house, Lahaina, December 3, 1823. We have for some time past been favored with the society of Dr. and Mrs. Blatchely. They occupy a new house in our enclosure; and were exposed to a serious accident last night, by the momentary touch of a candle against the thatch of the house, in passing through the door. The flame spread rapidly; but, by prompt exertions, was fortunately extinguished.

The greatest danger to which we feel ourselves exposed is from casualties of this kind. It seldom rains at Lahaina, and, in a short time after erecting a house, the grass thatch becomes perfect tinder; and in case of fire, unless suppressed at the instant it commences, the loss of the building, and of everything it contains, is inevitable. The rapidity of the flames scarcely admits the rescue of life, much less of property.

Native dwellings are objectionable in many respects. The wind, dust, and rain find ready access to ours in every part; and not only put us to great inconvenience, but often greatly endanger our health. The leaves of the sugarcane with which they are lined, and the grass and mats forming the floors, are secure and appropriate harbors for the mice, fleas, cockroaches and lizards which infest this land, and by which we are greatly annoyed. But, were the buildings ever so comfortable for the time being, their frailty would be an objection: the thatch must be frequently repaired, and the whole house entirely rebuilt every third or fourth year.

We are at a loss to determine what the materials of our permanent dwelling shall be. If constructed of wood, every part must come from America, the islands affording no timber for house-building, that is accessible, or to be obtained for a reasonable price. If of stone, the lime and lumber necessary to finish them must be procured in the same distant country; for the expense of burning lime here at present, would be greater than the cost of it in America, and its freight to the islands.

Dec. 6. Two days ago we had the happiness of receiving Mr. Ely and Mr. Whitney to our habitations. Mr. Ely returned to Oahu again to-day: and was accompanied by Dr. and Mrs. Blatchely. They sailed in the Arab, Capt. Meek, to whom we have been indebted for much politeness.

Dec. 15. Immediately after the last date, I was seized with a violent illness, from which I am now but just recovering. Mrs. Richards also suffered an alarming attack; and B—— was at the same time confined to her bed. Our situation required the unremitting attentions, night and day, for near a week, both of Mr. Richards and H——, on whom the care of Mrs. Richards's infant, as well as that of C——, necessarily devolved. Mr. Richards was obliged to be physician as well as nurse; and spent many anxious hours in searching medical authorities, while alarming symptoms called for immediate relief.

We have deeply felt the importance of an additional physician to the missionary establishment at the islands. One physician cannot possibly meet the necessities of families so widely dispersed as we are. The extreme stations are more than four hundred miles apart; and in any case of emergency, it would be impracticable to secure at one of these the services of a practitioner who might be at the other.

But the want of a physician is not at such times the only cause of anxiety and distress,—is not all that makes the difference between a chamber of sickness in a heathen land, and in the habitations of our fathers. Our nearest friends, instead of hanging on our pillows with kind and assiduous attention, are obliged to exhaust themselves in the lowest drudgery, without an assistant to share even the hardest of their labor. No kind friend calls, to sympathize with us in our sufferings, or to relieve, during the watches of the night, those who are overcome by the fatigues of the day. Our establishment affords few of the articles which at home are considered indispensable to the comfort of a sick room ; and when the violence of disease is removed, we have no delicacy to tempt the fastidious appetite of an invalid, or cordial to revive the drooping spirits of the languid and the faint.

We mention these facts, not to complain of the privations of which we are sensible ; for through the grace of God, we do sincerely esteem them the "light afflictions" that deserve not to be named, in comparison with the everlasting benefits we trust we are securing to the heathen ; but only to exhibit to you the various and true shades of missionary life.

Dec. 17. Mr. Whitney, who returned to us on the 14th instant, from a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Thurston, sailed again this evening for Oahu.

Dec. 27. On the evening of the day on which Mr. Whitney arrived at Oahu from Kauai, a trunk, containing his clothes and papers, was stolen from the hall of the mission house at Honolulu. No knowledge of the thief was obtained until within a day or two, though suspicion rested on the attendants of some of the chiefs who were at the house in the dusk of the evening. This morning a messenger from Kaikioewa, the guardian of the prince, came before sunrise to inform me that Mr. Whitney's trunk had been found in the possession of a follower of the young chief, and to request me to be present at the examination of it, previous to its being delivered to the care of the mission. On my arrival at the establishment of the chief, the trunk was produced, and as much of its former contents as could be found, replaced. It was then formally given up, in presence of a large assembly of the people, of the prince and his guardian, including all their personal attendants, male and female ; while the culprit was, with judicial solemnity, publicly reprov'd by Kaikioewa, and punished by dismissal from the service of Kauikeaouli.

In the course of the investigation, it was ascertained that the kahu, nurse, or chief personal attendant of the prince, was accessory to the theft. He was immediately called, and ordered to bring forward the personal effects of the chief, of which he had the care, for inspection, preparatory to his dismissal from his situation. In the course of the morning, the clothes, furniture, books, &c. in his possession were examined; and after an inventory of them had been taken in the presence of all the high chiefs, they were delivered, as insignia of the office, to another petty chief, while the former kahu was disgraced by a public expulsion from the household of the lad.

We were much gratified with the manliness and resolution of the prince on this occasion. He is only nine years old, was strongly attached to his kahu, having been carried in his arms from his birth, and wept much when parting with him; still he said he must go, or by and by it would be thought that he himself was heva, guilty, and that if he kept thieves in his train, it would be said that he ordered them to steal.

This is the most decisive measure ever taken by a chief, for the suppression of theft; and will doubtless produce a happy effect. Formerly, the chiefs themselves were greatly addicted to this crime; but, finding it disgraceful in the eyes of foreigners, left the commission of it to their attendants; most of them, it is said, have until lately taken with them in all their visits, persons expressly for the purpose. Not long before our arrival, one of the missionaries suffered so much from the depredations of a high female chief, in the habit of visiting his family, that he openly turned both her and her husband from his house.

The islanders are exceedingly expert in the achievement of theft. Not many weeks since a chief of rank, with two or three servants, called for a few moments at our establishment. The attendants remained about the door, while their master entered the house. On a clothes line, in open view, three or four French silk handkerchiefs of very peculiar pattern and colors were hanging; although all the doors and windows were open, and some of the mission family in sight the whole time, on the departure of the company, one of the handkerchiefs was missing. We could however scarce suspect them; for it seemed impossible that any one of their number, in the short time of the call, and under such circumstances of exposure, could be guilty; but not long afterwards an islander, who had been within a short time at the residence of the chief, on another island, seeing me with an article of the same kind, exclaimed in admiration of the colors, "O, that is a very handsome handkerchief — just such a one as our chief wears!"

We are constantly losing, in this manner, articles of greater or less value; in two or three instances, clothes to a very considerable amount have been taken from trunks, the locks of which are broken while the persons have been sitting upon them, and apparently deeply interested in conversation with some of the family. In these instances, however, they were dressed in large kiheis, which give concealment to their movements, and afforded a cover for the booty in their retreat.

The remedy of the evil is with the chiefs; if they really discountenance this vice, which we believe many now do, and punish it, when detected, with promptness and determination, as in the present instance, stealing will soon be unpopular.

Sabbath, Jan. 4, 1824. The services of the chapel to-day have been distinguished by the baptism of the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Richards, and by the administration of the Lord's supper. The day has been one of peace and blessedness; and the language of our hearts that of the Psalmist, "We will give thanks to thee, O Lord, among the heathen, and will sing praises unto thy holy name."

Jan. 7. Our customary visits to the chiefs this morning were more than usually pleasant. We found them at their several establishments intently occupied in their studies, and uncommonly solicitous for instruction. We were particularly gratified with the appearance of our friends, Kaikioewa, the guardian of the young prince, and his wife Kea-weamahi. The former was reclining on a neat Chinese sofa, earnestly engaged with the few pages yet printed in the native tongue, and the latter seated at a very handsome cabinet with book-case top, writing a letter.

Besides these two pieces of furniture, which would be neat and ornamental in any common parlor, there was another sofa in the room, a very large mahogany dining table, two circular tables of the same material, with an elegant escritoir on each, a handsome card table and dressing case, and a large and expensive mirror. The whole house exhibited a degree of neatness, comfort, and convenience, not often found in the dwellings even of the highest chiefs, and excited a pleasing hope of seeing still greater improvements in the externals of social and domestic life.

They were both clothed in loose dresses made in the European fashion ; and in their persons, more than in the furniture of their apartment, presented a strong contrast to the appearance they made but a year or two since, when seen only in unblushing nakedness ; and when they knew no higher subjects of thought or occupation, than to “ eat, drink, and be merry.”

These two are among the most amiable of our friends. Their deportment is at all times modest, dignified, and interesting ; and their whole character, so far as we can gain the knowledge of it, so consistent with Christian propriety and purity, that in our intercourse with them we almost forget that they have been heathen. They are assiduous in their attention to every means of instruction, are never absent from the services of the chapel, and not unfrequently are seen bathed in tears, under the preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. May they be found among the first fruits of Hawaii !

Friday, Jan. 9. While at tea this evening we heard a herald passing through the district—the manner in which all the general orders of the king and chiefs are communicated to their vassals—making a proclamation to the people. On inquiring of the native boys in our yard, we learned that the object of it was to inform the people that the next day but one would be the Sabbath, and to command them to have all their food prepared on the morrow, and not to break the commandment of God, by working on the “la kabu,” sacred day. Heralds have very frequently been sent out on a Saturday evening, to give intelligence of the approach of the Sabbath, and to command its observance ; but this is the first time we have heard it notified so seasonably, as to take all excuse from those who disregard it.

Jan. 12. There is, perhaps, no one in the nation, who has given more uninterrupted and decisive proofs of a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, than Puaiki, a poor blind man. No one has manifested more childlike simplicity and meekness of heart—no one appeared more uniformly humble, devout, pure, and upright.

As a singer, he formerly occupied in the retinue of a high chief, the place of "the blind bard" in the baronial hall. When "the setters forth of strange gods" arrived, and began to preach in the language of the country, he requested to be led to the chapel; and ever after, with the return of the Sabbath, groped his way to the house of God. He soon became deeply interested in the glad tidings which proclaimed sight to the blind, relinquished his situation as musician, and from the most indefatigable inquiry and attention, quickly made himself so familiarly acquainted with the outline of Christian belief and practice, as to become an instructor and chaplain to others. Only a few weeks before the Thames reached the islands, Keoua, governor of Lahaina, then on a visit at Oahu, appointed him his private chaplain, and brought him to Maui with him in that capacity. He was the first to welcome us on our unexpected arrival here, as we stepped upon the beach; and testified his joy by the most cordial shaking of our hands, and by bursting afresh every few minutes into the exclamation, "aloha loa no!"—"aloha ino loa!" "great indeed—very great is my love!"

He is always at the house of God, and there ever at the preacher's feet. If he happens to be approaching our habitations at the time of family worship, which has been very frequently the case, the first note of praise or word of prayer, that meets his ear, produces an immediate and most observable change in his whole aspect. An expression of deep devotion at once overspreads his sightless countenance, while he hastens to prostrate himself in some corner in an attitude of reverence. Indeed so peculiar has the expression of his countenance sometimes been, both in public and domestic worship—especially when he has been joining in a hymn in his own language to the praise of the only true God and Saviour—an expression so indicative of peace and elevated enjoyment, that tears have involuntarily started in our eyes at the persuasion that, ignorant and degraded as he once had been, he was then offering the sacrifice of a contrite heart, and was experiencing a rich foretaste of that joy, which in the world to come shall terminate in "pleasures forever more." pray. The accompanying circumstances were peculiarly interesting, and conduced to the deep impression made by it on my mind. Mr. Richards and myself, having discovered that there was a number of natives in our vicinity, called by their fellows, the "poe pule,"—"praying people," from a habit of secret prayer, as well as an attendance on the exercises of social and public worship, sought them out, and assembled them to the number of twelve or fifteen, for the purpose of inquiring into their state of mind and feelings, upon the subject of Christianity; and of instructing and encouraging them in the belief and practices of religion.

Puaiki was the first convert of the mission I ever heard

Our object will be best understood by a specimen of the kind of questions put to them, and the answers given in a particular case. Of an interesting young man, Mr. Richards asked, "When did you first hear the word of God?" "At the time Mr. Ellis first preached on his arrival from the Society islands." "What did you think of what you heard?" "I had no thought about it." "What were your thoughts of it, when you first had them?" "They were evil only. I did not like the law of God, for my heart was set on every wicked thing. I loved every sin, and was wicked in all my ways." "When did you begin to think more favorably of the true religion?" "When I came to Lahaina to live, after the king had sailed for England," stating in addition, that it was by coming to the chapel that he began to love the word of God; that now his love for it was very great; that he hated all his former ways, and loved everything that was good; and concluding by saying, "Great is my compassion for the dark hearts, that have been kindling a fire to the devil—some of the people had recently been sacrificing to their former gods by the burning of animals, &c. &c.—and strong is my prayer, that God may forgive them their sin, and enlighten them by his spirit!"

In the statements of many others there was a simplicity of language and manner, and an artlessness and sincerity that affected the hearts of all present. The countenance and gestures of some spoke even more for them than their words; and of a majority of the number, we were led to entertain very favorable hopes.

At the conclusion of the meeting, we called upon our blind friend to address the throne of grace. The request was unexpected to him: but in a ready compliance, he evinced a pathos of feeling, a fervency of spirit, a fluency and propriety of diction, and above all a humility of soul, that plainly told he was no stranger there. His bended posture, his clasped hands, his elevated though sightless countenance, the peculiar emphasis with which he uttered the exclamation "O Jehovah!" his tenderness, his importunity, made us feel that he was praying to a God not afar off, but to one who was nigh, even in the midst of us. It was a prayer not to be forgotten: it touched our inmost souls, and we believe would have touched the soul of any one hearing it, not an utter stranger to the meltings of a pious spirit.

One such hour, one such testimony to the efficacy of the truth, in turning "from darkness to light and from the power of satan unto God," repays us tenfold for all our sacrifices, and makes us more than willing perseveringly to endure the toil, the privation, the care—the hundred known and unknown trials, that sap the spirits and the constitution of a missionary in a pagan land. At such times, could the continents and the oceans that separate us from the sight of the people of God, be thrown into the back ground for a moment, leaving these actors and these scenes to speak for themselves, they would feel more than compensated for all their liberality, and all their exertions to have the glorious gospel of Christ preached to the heathen: and giving thanks to God, would rejoice in fresh efforts to evangelize the world. If the poor blind Puaiki, is the only one of this nation, who has gained a true and ready access to the throne of grace, by Him who is "the way, the truth, and the life," and knows, from his own blessed experience, the breathings of the spirit that cries "Abba, Father," unto God, O! at how cheap a price has his immortal soul been enlightened unto everlasting life, through the instrumentality of the churches of America.

He is poor and despised, in his person small almost to deformity, and in countenance, from the loss of his sight, far from prepossessing; still in our judgment he bears on him "the image and superscription" of Christ. If so, how striking an example of the truth of the apostle's declaration: "God has chosen the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise; and the weak things of the world, to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world and things which are despised hath God chosen, yea, things which are not, to bring to nought things that are; that no flesh should glory in his presence."

Evening. Scarce a day passes on which we are not most painfully reminded, that we dwell among the habitations of cruelty. We have been much grieved this evening, by seeing the attendants of the young prince stoning a lunatic on the beach. It is the customary way of treating such objects throughout the islands, and the manner in which they here usually terminate a wretched existence. Kaikioewe sent a message to reprove them, and bid them desist from their inhuman sport; not, however, till by the barbarous practice the poor creature was much bruised and lamed.

The afflicted and the deformed of every class are objects of ridicule and contempt, if not, as in this case, of persecution. The helpless and dependent, whether from age or sickness, are often cast from the habitations of their relatives and friends, to languish and to die, unpitied and unattended. An instance recently came to our knowledge, in which a poor wretch had thus perished within sight of our dwelling, after having lain uncovered for days and nights in the open air, as we are told, most of the time, pleading in vain to his family, still within the hearing of his voice, for a drink of water! And when he was dead, his body, instead of being buried, was merely drawn so far into the bushes as to prevent the offence that would have arisen from the corpse, and left a prey to the dogs who prowl through the district in the night!

But the truth of the apostle's description of the heathen, that they are "without natural affection, implacable, and unmerciful," is found most fully, here, in the prevalence of the abhorrent and tremendous crime of infanticide. We have the clearest proof, that in those parts of the islands where the influence of the mission has not yet extended, nearly, if not quite two-thirds of the infants born, perish by the hands of their own parents before attaining the first or second year of their age !

The very periods, when the infant of a Christian mother is to her the object of intense solicitude, and of the deepest anxiety in times of sickness, suffering, and distress, times at which the affections of the parental bosom are brought into the most lively exercise, are those when the mother, here, feels that in her child she has a care and a trouble which she will not endure : and instead of searching into the causes of its sorrow, or attempting to alleviate its pains, she stifles its cries for a moment with her hand, hurries it into a grave already prepared for it, and tramples to a level the earth under which the offspring of her own bosom is struggling in the agonies of death ! As I see and hear and learn all the abominations and cruelties of a heathen land, my soul often melts within me ; and I cannot but think, how little a majority of the inhabitants of Christian countries are aware of the extent of their obligations to the gospel, for many of the domestic and social blessings they prize most dearly. Happy indeed is the people whose God is the Lord !

The perpetration of this crime is by no means confined to cases of sickness, or of deformity, or of distress : not unfrequently it is provoked by the simple necessity of half an hour's additional labor a day for the support of the child until it can seek its own living ; and sometimes merely because its helplessness would interfere, for a period, with the freedom and pleasure of the mother ! In view of a crime so relentless as to sink the guilty perpetrators of it below the nature of brutes, and which still forms but one of a fearful catalogue, I am often led to exclaim, " Oh ! can there be for such a redeeming and enlightening power ? Can these ever be transformed into beings of purity, of tenderness, and of love ? " Lord, thou knowest ! Thou didst say, " Let there be light ; and there was light : " and thou hast said, " As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord ! " Thy power will yet make true thy word : The isles have waited for thy law, and the abundance of the sea shall yet be converted unto Thee !

Jan. 16. Last night there was a beautiful and almost total eclipse of the moon. We had just retired to rest, when an alarm was given by the natives in our neighborhood. Loud and lamentable wailings were heard in various directions, while the half-suppressed and plaintive murmurings of those who with hurried footsteps passed to and fro, gave indications of something new and afflictive. Hearing a voice in our yard, I inquired the cause; and was answered that "the people thought the king was dead, because the moon was dark." This was the first intimation we had of the eclipse; and on looking out, at once saw the sublime, but innocent cause of the alarm.

Considerable numbers had gathered round our fence, and we heard nothing but the exclamations, "mahina mai! mai nui!" — the moon is sick, very sick! "mahina pupuka no!" — an evil moon, evil indeed! "ua pau ka mahina i ke akua!" — the gods are eating the moon! — uttered in tones of deep anxiety and distress. All agreed in considering it an omen of great calamity to the nation. The king had died at sea, or would soon die; or the prince, princess, one of the queens, or some member of the royal family would soon die: for the moon had formerly appeared just so, before the death of several great chiefs!

A young Englishman, of considerable intelligence and nautical information, residing with Kalaimoku, told us this morning, that he attempted to explain the cause of the phenomenon to the chiefs. They seemed rather sceptical, however, and, as an insurmountable objection to the truth of the rotatory motion of the earth, pointed to the opposite island, and said, "The world cannot turn round, for Lanai is always exactly there!"

While we lamented their ignorance and superstition, we could not but be amused by many of their ideas and expressions on the subject. The more enlightened, both chiefs and people, have some correct impressions of the matter, and have made great sport of the credulity of others, calling them "ka poe naau po," — the dark-hearted party. The whole circumstance forcibly brought to mind the appropriate and prophetic lines —

"They dread thy glittering tokens, Lord,
When signs in heaven appear,
But they shall learn thy holy word,
And love, as well as fear."

Monday, 19. At three o'clock yesterday morning, we were roused from sleep by the voice of our friend Mr. Ellis. On giving him admittance, we found him to be accompanied by Mr. Chamberlain, and quickly learned that they were only two of a party of thirteen from Honolulu, on their way to Hawaii, in the schooner Waterwitch, Mr. Hunnewell, master, to occupy a new station at Waiakea, in the district of Hilo. Dr. and Mrs. Blatchely, and Mr. and Mrs. Ruggles and children, landed immediately after; but the rest, Mr. and Mrs. Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Ely and child, and Mr. Hunnewell, not till after daybreak.

The knowledge you have of our establishment, its accommodations, &c. &c., may excite some curiosity as to the manner in which we discharge the rights of hospitality on such occasions. Fully aware, from our own experience, of the fatigue and exhaustion attendant on a voyage of two or three days in a small and crowded schooner, a first object in this case was to secure an opportunity of rest and sleep to our friends. To do this it became necessary to relinquish our own beds, and spread them anew for the females and children; while the gentlemen formed couches upon our trunks and the floor; and thus all were soon soundly asleep.

Another point of importance then presented itself, in the refreshment of food that would be requisite when they should awake. The coming day was the Sabbath. Our dinner for that day, as has always been the case, was prepared the day previous, but consisted of a piece of salt meat and a small loaf of bread, sufficient only for ourselves, and was entirely inadequate to the entertainment of our guests. Mrs. Richards and B—— were both too unwell to leave their beds, and every arrangement of course devolved upon H——.

After a few moments consultation, it was determined, that though the case was one which would warrant a departure from our regulations in reference to our cooking on the Sabbath, still, rather than be under the necessity of explaining the reasons to the natives for a deviation, whatever preparations were requisite, should be made immediately. I accordingly roused one or two of the boys living with us, with orders to kindle a fire and kill half a dozen ducks, which our yard very opportunely afforded ; and taking charge of master C—— myself, left his mother at liberty to repair to the kitchen.

This is a part of our establishment which I believe I have omitted to describe. It consists of a few loose stones, on one side of our enclosure, upon which a kettle, &c. is placed over a fire kindled on the ground between them ; and is covered with an awning of cocoanut leaves elevated eight or ten feet upon four poles. A principal article in its furniture is a baking-pan without a handle — a sad defect in a land without blacksmiths or iron — and which consequently can scarce be moved but at the risk of burnt fingers. Notwithstanding this and other disadvantages, however, before the dawning of the day, three successive pairs of ducks were dressed and cooked, an adequate supply of potatos and kalo baked, and the whole enclosure restored to as much order and quietude as if we had been asleep the whole night.

The morning was one of the most delightful we have known, fresh and rich in all the splendid tints of sunrise. Our admiration was especially excited by a full and distinct view of Hawaii, which we had never seen before since our arrival at Lahaina. In general, the atmosphere is not sufficiently clear to enable us at a distance of eighty or a hundred miles, to trace even the faintest outline of land in that direction ; but now, for an hour, while the sun was near the horizon, we saw its broad mountains rising in purpled majesty from the deep, while the icy summit of Mounakea glittered like a cluster of brilliants in the sky.

This unusual addition to the beauty of our scenery, bringing five islands, besides Maui, into distinct view from our door, connected with the arrival of our friends, and more particularly with their immediate destination to that island, bearing the richest of conceivable blessings to regions, which for ages unknown have been covered with the thick darkness of paganism, gave rise to emotions of a most pleasing and animating character.

The day, too, was uncommonly interesting. An immense concourse of people at the native meetings, gave Mr. Ellis an opportunity to disseminate the word of life ; and our own worship could not but be enlivened and warmed by the presence of so many of our fellow-laborers. "How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion : for there the Lord commandeth the blessing, even life forevermore."

At nine o'clock this morning they reembarked to pursue their voyage, not without having partaken, as we trust, in the quickening influences with which the visit has been accompanied to our own spirits. Our prayers follow them. May they be permitted safely to arrive at their destination, and triumphantly to unfurl the banner of the cross !

Jan. 24. The surf for some days past has been uncommonly heavy, affording a fine opportunity to the islanders for the enjoyment of their favorite sport of the surf-board. It is a daily amusement at all times ; but the more terrific the surf, the more delightful the pastime to those skilled in the management of the board.

For this amusement, a plank of light wood, eight or ten feet long, two feet broad, decreasing to a sharp edge at the sides and ends, which are rounded, and having the whole surface finely polished, is necessary ; and forms an article of personal property among all the chiefs, male and female, and among many of the common people.

With this plank under the arm, they leave the shore, and wade or swim into the surf. On meeting a roller, they dive under it with their board, to prevent being carried back by its power ; and thus make their way beyond the reef to the smooth surface of the sea, — at Lahaina, a quarter of a mile from the beach. They then wait the approach of a heavy wave, place themselves at full length flat upon the board, with the face downward and the head and chest elevated above the forward end, headed for the shore. In this attitude they take the breaker, mount upon its crest as it towers above the reef, and with the arms and feet skillfully keep their poise in the swell, so as not to be sufficiently forward to be overwhelmed by its combing, nor so far behind as to lose its impetus ; and are thus hurried, with the velocity of a racer, on the rolling summit, their erected heads only appearing above the foam until they are cast on the beach, or slip from the board in time to escape striking upon the sand.

They then make their way out again, and return in the same manner. Hundreds at a time have been occupied in this way for hours together, while the waves are breaking on the reef apparently twenty or thirty feet high. Riding upon the surf in a canoe in a similar manner, is also a common and favorite amusement.

Another pastime of the natives, where a spot of ground adapted to it can be found, is the tropical counterpart of a winter sport of boys in our country, that of sliding down hill on a sled.

The smooth sward of a suitable declivity is made to answer, in a good degree, the advantages of ice and snow, for this purpose; and throwing themselves forcibly, at the proper place, in the manner of the boys in America, upon a long narrow sledge, having light and highly polished runners, with their breasts pressing on the forepart, they often succeed in making a descent of one or two hundred yards at a single slide.

Jan. 31. For the last fortnight there has been an unusual and increasing demand for books in the native language. We distributed fifty this morning, before breakfast; and since then, three times that number have been called for. But our stock is entirely exhausted, and we have been compelled to send away hundreds of persons, with the promise of a supply as soon as a new edition shall be printed. Some new excitement in favor of the palapala, appears to have been produced on the minds of the chiefs and their attendants; and though we are ignorant of any particular reason for it, we trust the first cause is, the power of Him, in whose hands are the hearts of all men.

Feb. 2. Immediately after breakfast we made our customary visit to the chiefs and found them, with one exception, busily engaged in their studies. The queens and princess were writing at their desks, and their favorites and attendants, seated on the mats around them, were equally engaged with their slates and spelling books. The chiefs have lately, for the first time, manifested a special desire to have their immediate followers instructed. Indeed, till within a few weeks, they have themselves claimed the exclusive benefit of our instructions. But now they expressly declare their intentions to have all their subjects enlightened by the palapala, and have accordingly made application for books to distribute among them.

In consequence of this spirit, we have to-day been permitted to establish a large and regular school among their domestics and dependents. We have always had several scholars at the establishments of different chiefs, amounting in the whole perhaps to fifty individuals, under regular tuition; and Mrs. Richards, H—, and B—, besides instructing the boys in our families in their own language, have daily taught a few persons in English at our houses. But we have never till to-day had a regular systematic school, except with the chiefs, and the special favorites in their respective trains. The school formed, was entirely from the household of the young prince; and was held in a neat and spacious house prepared by him for the purpose. The names of twenty-five boys and young men were entered as scholars. The young chief himself presided as head of the school, under our superintendence.

Feb. 6. Yesterday afternoon we walked half a mile south of the mission house, to visit our friends Kaikioewa and Keaweamahī, who have taken possession of a new establishment in that part of the settlement; and to call on Auwae, a chief lately arrived at Lahaina from the windward part of the island. The inland walk to their plantations is the most pleasant in the district, passing, shortly after leaving the beach, through a large and beautiful grove of the cocoanut, and then through a succession of plantations, so thickly covered with bread-fruit trees, interspersed with a great variety of luxuriant vegetation, as to appear a continued and well-planted garden.

We have seen nothing, in the domestic improvement of the natives, that has pleased us so much as in this visit. Both chiefs have many acres enclosed, which is not common: Kaikioewa's, by a high mud wall; and Auwae's by a neat and substantial fence of sticks. The entrance to each is by a painted cottage gate. Their houses are larger and better built than those of most of the chiefs; indeed, we have seen none, but that of the king at Honolulu, that can compare with them, either in the excellence of the materials, or in the neatness of the construction. We were also particularly pleased with the accommodations for their servants and people. These, instead of having a part of the chief's house, which is not uncommon, or of having rude and dirty booths immediately about the doors, still more frequently the case, have neat but small houses, not more than six feet by four on the ground, and about four feet high, built regularly along the walls and fences. There are not less than a dozen such in Auwae's yard, which, peeping from under the thick foliage of the kou trees in the enclosure, add greatly to the beauty of the scene.

Keaweamahi is equally engaged in making improvements in her department; and we found her with an interesting group of female attendants, busily occupied in preparing a superb satin counterpane for a quilting frame, which an American carpenter, in the employment of her husband had made her. Being, however, entirely ignorant of the manner in which it should be done, she was well pleased to have the ladies give her a half hour's assistance.

This evening Auwae and wife returned our call. They came in while we were at the tea-table, but could not be prevailed on to join us. We could not but be amused at the evident reason—the poverty of our board in their eyes. A plate of toast, with a little force-meat, were the only articles besides the tea-service on the table, which, for half a dozen persons, when compared with the variety and quantity of food placed four times a day before the family of a chief, appeared to them a most scanty repast. They said but little while they remained, but in exclamations of sympathy at what they conceived to be our unavoidable hunger: "Aloha ino ia oukou,"—"great is our compassion for you,"—burst repeatedly from their lips; and they hastened their return, to send us some fish and potatoes immediately.

Feb. 7. The favorable auspices in reference to the schools, mentioned at the commencement of the week, have since greatly increased; and we have the happiness of stating, that, in addition to the school of the young prince, each of the chiefs now has one similar, under his special superintendence. The number of schools thus formed is ten, including in the whole nearly one hundred and fifty scholars. Applications have been made for the institution of several more, and we soon expect to have at least five hundred persons under regular tuition in this district.

The brig Neo came to an anchor this morning from Hawaii. The commander brought a present of oranges and a letter to H—— from our friend Kapiolani, the wife of Naihe. She earnestly entreats that books and slates may be sent to her people at Kealakekua, of which Naihe is hereditary chief, where she has lately returned, after an absence of two or three years at Oahu. Having herself been greatly benefited and enlightened by the instructions of the missionaries, she says she has great sorrow in her heart for the ignorance of her people at Hawaii; for they are "Nui loa naau po"—"very dark-minded."

Feb. 9. Mr. and Mrs. Richards, in company with Kalaimoku, sailed in the brig Ainoa this evening, for a short visit to Oahu.

Feb. 11. A delightful evening; one of the very few that are here marked with the higher splendors of sunset. The west is filled with rich and brilliant tints, the reflections of which give a softened beauty to the rugged heights of Lanai and Molokai; while they cover the bolder mountains of Maui with purple, and line the crimson clouds, that overhang them, with the deepest shades of amber and gold. Every object was so uncommonly lovely, that on my way to evening prayers, I involuntarily stopt, to give utterance to the emotions of admiration I felt at the beauty and serenity of land, and ocean, and sky.

The natives themselves seemed to partake in the quietude and peacefulness of the scene, and instead of finding them, as is usually the case at this time of the day, sporting in the surf or singing and dancing on the beach, they were seated in numerous groups, studying, conversing, or musing in silence. Two schools within a short distance of each other, each containing twenty or thirty scholars, were reciting to native teachers, while their respective chiefs, seated in large chairs, were presiding over the exercises. The monotonous sound of another, within the fort, was distinctly heard; while the distant hum of a fourth came across the water of a large fishpond, immediately in the rear of it. With such objects and sounds in full view and hearing, the transition of thought from the natural to the moral state of things around us, was easy, and almost unavoidable; and I never recollect having felt more calm and sober joy in the contemplation of my character as a missionary to the heathen, than at that moment. In anticipation of what, we hope, the intellectual and spiritual condition of this people, in comparison with their former paganism at no very distant period, will be, I could scarce avoid exclaiming, "Lo! the winter is past; the rain is over and gone: the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come!"

Sabbath, Feb. 22. The most interesting circumstance of the day, is an application for baptism from Kaikioewa and wife, from another chief and wife, Toteta, a Tahitian in the family of our patron Heapili, and from our friend the blind man, or Bartimeus, as he is sometimes called by us. This is the more notable, from the fact, that there is, and has been, no external circumstance that could operate as an undue excitement to anything of the kind. Every thing in the characters of these persons, as far as we can ascertain, sanctions the hope, that, through the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, they have been turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; and are proper subjects for the administration of the ordinance, the benefits of which they are desirous of receiving.

Such hopes, and such causes for high expectation, from this people, give sweetness to the missionary life. The number of those, of whose saving conversion from sin to holiness we entertain even the faintest hope, is small indeed; but in the midst of a generation "filled with all wickedness," though few, they are conspicuous and lovely. It is a glorious consolation to us in these "ends of the earth," to know, that, had we not forsaken things most dear, to bear the lamp of eternal truth in this darkness, these very individuals, now so indescribably interesting, would still have been groping in the thickest shades of spiritual death, and stumbling on the dark mountains of sin. What cannot the word of God perform on them in whom it "worketh effectually!" How changed are these! Unto them the gospel has been preached, and by it they have been transformed into new creatures; have become gentle, temperate, industrious, modest, chaste, sober, devout—yes, even devout and holy. Such, at least, in our eyes they appear, and such we fully believe them to be.

Feb. 28. In returning from a walk before breakfast this morning, I witnessed, for the first time, a rite of sorcery. My attention was attracted by a collection of persons near the path along which I was passing. On approaching them, I saw in the midst a small mat covered with several thicknesses of kapa or native cloth, on the top of which were placed two very large leaves, of a plant called by the natives api—arum costatum. These seemed to have been prepared for the occasion with much care, each being nicely divided through the stem, half the length of the leaf, and one placed exactly over the other. They were firmly held by a man kneeling at one end of the mat, while the sorcerer kneeling at the other, and holding two of the divided stems in each hand, muttered his prayers over them. A few of the persons present, besides those immediately engaged in the ceremonies, were solemnly and intently occupied in the subject before them; but the greater number seemed disposed to make sport of it, and turned to me with the exclamations, "ino, pupuka, debelo," "wicked, foolish, devilish."

On inquiring what was meant by it, they answered, that some one had stolen the tobacco-pipe of the man holding the leaves, and that the sorcerer was discovering the thief, and praying him to death. When reproved for their superstition and wickedness, they became evidently confused, and some unlucky movement of the leaves being made, the principal performer said the effect was destroyed, and ceased praying, apparently in a fit of vexation.

There is no superstition perhaps more general and deep-rooted in the minds of this people, than the belief that certain persons have the power, by prayers and incantations, to destroy the lives of others; and many, doubtless, have become victims to their credence in this device of darkness. A person who has fallen under the displeasure of one of these "kanaka anana," or sorcerers, is told that his power is exercised over him, and that he will die. He himself believes in the efficacy of that power—thinks perhaps that he has known many instances of it. Anxiety is awakened; his mind becomes filled with pictures of death; he cannot sleep; his spirits sink; his appetite fails; and the effects of his imaginary fears become the real causes of the evil he deprecates. Finding his health and strength affected by these natural but unperceived causes, he considers his fate inevitable; refuses all nourishment as unnecessary and unavailing; pines, languishes, and dies, beneath the influences of his own ignorance and superstition. The less enlightened of the people think no one dies a natural death, and resolve every instance of mortality into the effects of this pule anana, prayer of sorcery, some other incantation of a similar kind, or into the equally insidious influence of secret poison.

Of the power of this superstition we had a proof in a native of our own household. A thief was put to flight from the mission yard one day while we were at dinner: this lad joined in the chase, and seized the culprit, but lost his hold by the tearing of his kihci, or outer garment. The thief was greatly exasperated, and immediately engaged a sorcerer to pray the boy to death.

Information of this reached the lad in the course of the afternoon; and we soon perceived that he was troubled by the intelligence, although he attempted with us to ridicule the superstition.

The next morning he did not make his appearance with the other boys; and, on asking the reason, they said he was sick. We asked the nature of his illness; to which they replied, "Mai no i ka pule anana paha,"—"sick from the prayer of sorcery perhaps." On going in search of him, he was found lying in one corner of his house, pale with fear, and trembling like an aspen leaf, and discovered that he had not slept during the night. Satisfied of the cause of his illness, and that the whole arose from terror, we compelled him, notwithstanding his declaration that he was too ill, to come from his retreat; diverted his mind; set him at work; and, before noon, he was as full of life and spirits as ever — laughed at his fears, and began to defy the power of the pule anana !

The whole race are subject, from ignorance and superstition, to a bondage of terror. Not only do the eclipse and the earthquake, the burstings of a thunderbolt and the eruptions of a volcano, fill them with apprehension and dismay, but even the darkness of the night is to them the covert of demons going about “seeking whom they may devour;” and the least unusual sound that breaks its silence, interpreted into prowlings of spirits ready to destroy.

As the wind has sighed through the tops of the cocoa-nut tree in the stillness of the night, or the sounds of the surf, breaking on the reef, have bellowed along the shore, I have seen fear gathering on the faces of the natives of our household, while with troubled and inquisitive look and half-suppressed breath, they have exclaimed, “He Akua! He Akua aole maikai!” — “a God! — an evil God” And I have known the simple and plaintive notes of an Eolian harp attached to a window of the mission house at Oahu, so in this manner to affect the mind of an islander belonging to the establishment, as to make it necessary — although the harmless cause of the sound had been explained to him — to remove it to enable him to sleep.

CHAPTER XI.

RESIDENCE AT LAHAINA.

Mission house, Lahaina, March 1, 1824. There has not been a period, my dear M——, since H—— and myself left America, when the privilege of writing to those we love — of making known to them the particulars of our situation, and of imparting the thoughts and feelings of our hearts — has appeared more precious than at present, when, from the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Richards, at Oahu, we are left entirely alone on one of the specks of desolation that constitute this solitary group. ‘The want of all society, except that of our own little family, predisposes us in an unusual degree to frequent recollection of home: and we have never, perhaps, thought more, spoken more, and felt more, concerning yourself and family, and the many other objects of our lasting attachment and warm remembrance, than at the passing time.

The weather, too, to-day is of a character to recall to our minds scenes in which we have often had a part, when a gloomy sky and driving storm have shut us within the walls of our houses, and, by interrupting the ordinary engagements without doors, have made us, in an especial manner, dependent on the family circle and fireside for pleasure and amusement. Indeed, the present aspect of everything without is one principal reason why I have taken up my pen: it is so totally different from all we have witnessed, except in one or two instances, since we arrived at the islands, that it is more worthy of notice than anything that is just now taking place.

Instead of my own language, however, I will make use of a few lines from a Sea Sketch, which occurs at the moment to my mind. They are highly descriptive of the actual state of things around us, and will convey, I think, a correct and lively image of the scene:

— “Dark and portentous clouds o’erhang the sea,
While here and there upon the surgy tide,
With bellied sails, the vessels — dim descried —
Against the opposing blast toil heavily;
On sullen wing, the sea-gull wheels away
To loftiest rock, beyond the utmost swell
Of billow, lashing high its dizzy spray;
The wild waves curl their bleak and foamy heads — Tumultuous murmurs through the ocean caves
Ring dismal; while the gloomy tempest spreads
Athwart the joyless deep; the showers down pour,
Toss the rough main, and drench the sandy shore.”

We have before us the reality of every image here presented; and none in more conspicuous and beautiful exhibition, than “the vessel” on the “surgj tide,” with “bellied sails,” against the “opposing blast.” The young prince is slightly indisposed, and, notwithstanding the violence of the storm, a schooner has been despatched for the chiefs at Oahu, and is plunging her way through the channel under a press of sail that buries her almost in every wave she meets.

Monday, March 8. Mr. and Mrs. Richards returned from Oahu, in the Haaheo o Hawaii, on Saturday morning. Mr. and Mrs. Bishop came with them. They have been passing the winter at Kauai, with Mr. Whitney; and sailed this morning for Hawaii, as permanent associates of Mr. and Mrs. Thurston at Kailua, the principal town of the island, and the residence of the governor. Kalaimoku and Kaahumanu, who are the regents of the islands in the absence of the king, despatched the barge to the windward expressly for the purpose of returning Mr. and Mrs. Richards to Lahaina, and of carrying Mr. and Mrs. Bishop to their station at Hawaii—a mark of kindness sufficiently indicative of their good-will to the mission.

Until the present time, the hymns used in the native churches have been in manuscript. An edition is now printed, and Mr. Richards has brought a quantity for distribution at Lahaina. The knowledge of their arrival has spread rapidly through the settlement, and our houses are thronged with eager applicants for them. The richest treasure could scarce be received with greater enthusiasm than these “himeni paiaa,”—stamped hymns, as they are called.

March 13. Late at night. The tempestuous character of this month is as marked here as in most other parts of the world, notwithstanding the general and almost uninterrupted serenity of the rest of the year. I am now writing in the midst of one of the most violent storms I ever witnessed. For the first time since our residence on the islands, the “artillery of heaven” is playing so near our dwellings as to turn the admiration we have felt in its more distant peals, into momentary terror. An incessant glare of lightning breaks through the chinks of the door and windows and the various loopholes of our house, while the wind and rain rush upon us from every part of the roof and sides, and threaten our hut with instant destruction. The water, to the depth of a foot, is running in a rapid current through B——’s room, forming a small wing to ours, and Mr. Richards's house is entirely overflowed.

The raging of the tempest as it rushes from the ocean, the tumult of the waters, the thundering of the surf on the reef, and its heavy lashings along the shore, the wrenching, bending, and cracking of our huts, as the gale sweeps over and around them, make a total of circumstances that would present rather a gloomy picture to our friends who have known the desolating storm only by the sound as it "howl'd o'er their steady battlements." We are seeking a partial refuge from the rain under our umbrellas; and H—— has been sitting for hours with C—— in her arms, watching the motion of the rafters in the contentions of the wind, ready to make an escape with him from the ruins of our cabin.

March 18. Our friend Hoapili, in a call after dinner to-day, told us that some of his men, who had just come from the mountains, reported a ship in the Molokai channel. Feeling disposed for a ramble, I took a glass, and proceeded up the mountain two or three miles, to ascertain in what direction the vessel, said to be in sight, was proceeding. I soon descried the sail, and perceived it to be the native brig Waverly. Finding myself in the vicinity of a couple of lofty mounds, that form a prominent feature in the scenery to the north of Lahaina, I extended my walk to them.

They form the opposite sides of an ancient crater, still bearing strong marks of the action of fire, though the bottom is covered with grass. On the top of the highest elevation, there is an irregular enclosure, with a number of large conical heaps of stone at the corners and along the sides. From its situation and general appearance, I judged it to be the ruins of an hei-au; in which impression I was soon afterwards confirmed by the melancholy evidence of several skulls, and various bones of the human body, but partially buried beneath the fragments of lava with which the area was covered.

In returning, after descending a precipice of fifty or sixty feet, I followed the windings of a deep and romantic glen, scarce a hundred yards wide, filled with kalo, sugarcane, and bananas; and through which the largest mountain stream that waters the plantations of Lahaina, makes its rapid course. Both sides are overhung by monstrous ledges of black rock ; in many clefts of which, whole families are living without any defence from the weather, by night or by day, but such as nature has provided.

Before I reached home, the Waverly had come to an anchor. Shortly after, Capt. Smith and Mr. Dana, of Honolulu — who have chartered the brig for a voyage to the Society islands and New-Zealand — called on us ; and, much to our joy, put into our hands a large packet of letters and papers from America. They were brought by the Parthian, Capt. Rogers, of Boston, arrived within a few days at Oahu. You may judge of the interest with which they were received, from the fact that the tea-table, at which we were just taking our seats when the gentlemen entered, remained in statu quo until after ten o'clock.

Disease and death, it appears, are still carrying on their work of destruction among those we have known ; and dispensations, which with the most touching eloquence say to the lover of the world, "Turn ye, turn ye at my reproof," and to the child of God, "This is not thy rest," have filled the halls of some with sadness, and hung the habitations of others with the tapestry of wo. If we needed anything to reconcile us to the sacrifices we have made from a sense of duty, we could find sources abundant, in some of the intelligence brought us by this arrival, in most striking and melancholy lessons on the folly and danger of any course of conduct that centres in the pleasures, the riches, the honors, or any of the perishable gifts of the world.

We are still blessed with health, strength, spirits, and the happiness that springs from a prospect of continued life and usefulness ; while some, who thought and spoke of us as little better than idiots, for removing far from all possibility of an advancement in life, and throwing ourselves away in an enterprise so wild and visionary as they considered that in which we are engaged, have already been suddenly arrested in their aspiring career ; and while "seeking great things for themselves," have been cut down like a summer flower, and now lie withering in the grave. Their visions of worldly honor and of earthly joy are fled forever ; and an eternity which recognizes nothing as praiseworthy or honorable in itself, that the world calls good or great, is their all. Such instances, though melancholy in the extreme to the mind that is accustomed to follow the naked spirit to the bar of God, still are salutary in their admonitions. They teach us the end of "the pride of life," and shew what vanities wealth and honor are, when compared with the salvation of our own souls or the spiritual benefit of our fellow immortals: and in view of them, we cannot but thank God that grace was ever given to us, if such is the happy fact, to withdraw the supreme affections of our hearts from the things that are "seen and temporal," and to elevate and fix them on those which are "unseen and eternal."

Sabbath, 21. The audience at the native service this morning was unusually large, attentive, and solemn. The sermon was on the judgment, and many seemed deeply affected by it; especially our friend Keaweama, the wife of Kaikioewa. She shed tears frequently during the preaching, and when we closed the worship by singing a version of the hymn, "Lo! he comes with clouds descending," burst into an uncontrolled fit of weeping. Auna, the Tahitian chief, led the exercises of the afternoon, before embarking on board the Waverly to return to the Society islands, on account of the health of his wife. He is a noble example of the power of the gospel on the heart and character of a pagan. His wife is a very handsome woman; and in her general appearance and manners remarkably like one of the most polished females I ever saw.

Friday, 26. This morning a squadron of native vessels passed, with the body of governor Cox, who died this week at Oahu, bound to Kailua, where the corpse is to be deposited. All the principal chiefs who have been residing here, excepting Wahine Pio, at present governess of Lahaina, went some time since to attend him in his illness; and have now gone to Kailua to the funeral.*

* NOTE, (from the first London edition.) Governor Cox was the son of Keeaumoku, the warlike and ambitious chief of Kailua, and the northern part of Hawaii, who was commander-in-chief of Kamehameha's forces in all his war campaigns; and was succeeded by Kalaimoku, as prime minister in the government of the islands. He appears to have been a man of adventurous, daring, and sanguinary character; was a principal agent in elevating Kamehameha to the throne of Hawaii; and in the battle of Keēi, the assassination of Keona, and the subjugation of the other islands he bore a conspicuous part. His family comprises by far the most powerful portion of the aristocracy of the islands. He left four children, namely, Kaahumanu, the queen-dowager of Kamehameha, (in whom at present, with Poki, is vested the regency of Hawaii) Piia, and another of Kamehameha's queens. Kuakine, the present chief of Hawaii, and governor Cox, who bore his father's name, and was called by the people Kēēaʻaumoku, literally the Island-climbing Swimmer, — from ke, the; a, swimmer, or to swim; ee, to climb, as upon a rock, or up a ship's side; and moku, an island. Under Keopuolani, Kēēaʻaumoku was governor of Maui; in person, and in disposition, he resembled Kaahumanu more than any other member of the family; and, prior to the frequent attacks of disease that he experienced during the last years of his life, appears to have possessed in some degree the enterprise which marked his father's character. He was among the first to sanction the residence of the missionaries from America, and uniformly befriended them. On our arrival in 1822, we found the steward of his household was a native of the Society islands, a brother to the wife of one of our native teachers. This procured us an introduction. He was the first to desire instruction, to establish a school for the instruction of his people, and establish family worship in his house. The illness that immediately preceded his dissolution, was painful, and somewhat protracted; at first some of the chiefs imagined he was suffering from sorcery, but afterwards imbibed more rational ideas. I visited him daily during his illness, and hope and fear alternately occupied my mind respecting him. I sometimes found him engaged in ejaculatory prayer: "Lord, thou knowest my deeds from my youth up: thou knowest my sins; Lord, forgive them: save me by Jesus Christ the only Saviour!" were some of the expressions I once heard him use. He wished to be baptized when near his end; this, however, we thought proper to decline, lest he or the natives should think there was any saving efficacy connected with such Christian rite, in regard to the soul's acceptance with God, irrespective of that moral purity, or cleansing and sanctifying, of which it is the appointed emblem. He died on the 22d of March, while I was engaged in the act of prayer by his bedside, and we hope his spirit entered the abodes of rest and happiness. — William Ellis.

Matheson, in his "Narrative of a Visit to Brazil, Chile, Peru, and the Sandwich Islands, in the years 1821 and 1822," gives the following account of a visit to his establishment.

all American, have left us to-day, after a visit of a fortnight. We have received many expressions of kindness and friendship from them ; and saw them take their departure with regret.

August 5. This morning I went to Coxe, intending to purchase some goats. I expected to find him as usual, either sleeping, or smoking, or drinking, or busy trafficking like myself. The door of his hut was half open, and I was about to enter unceremoniously, when a scene too striking ever to be forgotten, and which would require the hand of a master painter to do it justice, suddenly arrested my whole attention.

About a dozen natives of both sexes were seated in a circle, on the matted floor of the apartment, and in the midst of them sat John Honolii, the Hawaiian catechist. All eyes were bent upon him ; and the variously expressive features of each individual marked the degree of interest excited by what was passing in his mind. So absorbed, indeed, were they in their reflections, that my abrupt appearance at the door created for some time neither interruption nor remark. The speaker held in his hand the gospel of St. John, as published at Tahiti, and was endeavoring, by signs and familiar illustrations, to render its contents easy of comprehension. His simple yet energetic manner added weight to his opinions, and proved that he spoke, from personal conviction, the sincere and unpremeditated language of the heart.

The chief himself stood in the back-ground, a little apart from the rest, leaning upon the shoulder of an attendant. A gleam of light suddenly fell upon his countenance, and disclosed features on which wonder, anxiety, and seriousness, were imprinted in the strongest characters. He wore no other dress than the malo round his waist ; but his tall athletic form and bust seen bending over the other's shoulders, and dignified demeanor, marked at one glance his rank and superiority over all around. One hand was raised instinctively to his head in a pensive attitude. His knitted brows bespoke intense thought ; and his piercing black eyes were fixed upon the speaker with an inquiring, penetrating look, as much as to say, "Can what you tell us be really true ?" I gazed for some minutes with mute astonishment, turning my regards from one to the other, and dreading to intrude upon the privacy of persons so usefully employed. At last the chief turned round, and motioned with his hand in a dignified manner, for me to withdraw. I did so ; but carried away in my heart the remembrance of a scene to which the place, the people, and the occasion, united in attaching a peculiar interest.

I learnt afterwards that Coxe had promised to build a school-house and present it to the missionaries for their use : a donation, which, considering his acknowledged love of money, affords no mean proof that his inquiries into the truth of the new religion had not been altogether fruitless.

Wednesday, 14. Laanui, who is particularly desirous of conforming to the customs of civilized and Christian society, called on us this morning. He arrived only a day or two since from Kailua, where he has been to attend the funeral of governor Cox ; and expects to sail for Oahu this evening. When taking his leave, he laughingly said that it was not his farewell call—that towards night, when he was near sailing, he would come again to say aloha, and to wail: referring to a custom of the natives of weeping aloud when they meet and part. It was, however, only in pleasantry, for he has long ceased to wail on any occasion.

In continuation of the conversation, he remarked that the Hawaiians thought us a very cold-hearted people, because we only shook hands and nodded our heads at each other when we met or separated. Whereas their love was so great, that they always touched noses and wailed. Namahana, his wife, one of the queens of Kamehameha, he said, wailed still, but he himself had not since the teachers came. "I knocked out my teeth too," he added, putting a finger in the place where two of his front teeth were missing, "when Kamehameha died, so great was my love for him! I then thought it was very good ; but when the light came, I found it to be very bad : and there was great sorrow among the rest of my teeth for the two that were gone, but I could not make new teeth." "Naa po, nui loa elieli!" "dark was my heart—very, very black!"

Thursday, 15. Keaweamahi, who is making a dress of fawn-colored satin, under the superintendence of H—, and at present spends the greater part of the day with us, asked this morning with great simplicity, "from what part of America sailors came—whether they did not worship idols—and had never heard of God?" The question does not speak much for the character of some of our countrymen, even in the estimation of the heathen ; and made us sigh to think of the depravity of example, that could call forth the query from this interesting pagan.

Thursday, 22. Capt. Wilds, of Boston, lately arrived at Oahu in the Parthian, came to Lahaina yesterday. It has been requested that I should join Mr. Ellis at Oahu, while Mr. Bingham and family make a proposed visit to Kaui: and Capt. Wilds having very politely offered a passage to myself and family, we shall probably go to Honolulu on Saturday.

Mission house at Honolulu, island of Oahu, Monday, 26.

H——, myself, C——, and B——, embarked with Capt. Wilds on Saturday afternoon, and landed at this place yesterday morning, just after breakfast. All our friends are in health except Mrs. Ellis, who has long been suffering under severe and protracted disease.

Tuesday, April 27. The day being unusually fine, Mr. Bingham proposed after breakfast, this morning, that I should accompany him to the pali, or precipice, of Kolau, about seven miles in the interior. Nothing short of the testimony of my own eyes could have made me believe that there was so much of the “sublime and beautiful” in the vicinity of Honolulu. It seemed like enchantment, to find myself transported, in the short space of an hour, from the dusty plain, stagnant pools, dreary beach, and various desolations of the seaside, to the freshness and verdure, luxuriance, and bloom, of a woodland region, where the eye rested only on objects of grandeur and beauty, and the ear caught no sounds, amid the solitude of the forest, but the chirping of birds, the murmurs of the mountain stream, or the dashing of the distant cascade.

The path we took led up the valley immediately in the rear of the village. As this gradually contracted from a width of three to that of one mile, the scenery became more and more picturesque and delightful, until at a distance of five miles from Honolulu, it far surpasses anything I ever before beheld. The mountains are so lofty and so graceful in their outlines — so rich and beautiful in their foliage, so diversified by dark grottos, projecting cliffs and spouting waterfalls, while all below presents an exuberance of vegetation almost incredible — that I cannot but think it among the finest of the exhibitions of nature, in a state of undisturbed simplicity and wildness. Such was the character of the scenery for the two last miles of the walk, while our path led successively through glade, copse and dell, and was frequently, for long distances together, entirely embowered by the interlacing branches of the spreading hau-tree, a species of hibiscus.

After ascending from one of these dank passages, Mr. Bingham suddenly cautioned me against the violence of the wind we should meet. At the same time the rushing of heavy blasts was heard, intimating, like the roarings of a cataract or the mutterings of a volcano, an approach to one of the more sublime of the phenomena of nature; and on abruptly turning the angle of a projecting rock — with an admiration approaching to terror — I found myself balancing, in strongly conflicting currents of air, on the brink of a precipice little less than a thousand feet in perpendicular descent, without the parapet of a single stone to guard against the fatal consequences of a false step. Immediately before us, at the foot of this tremendous offset, in most perfect bird's-eye view, lay a widely extended, cultivated, and thickly inhabited country, against whose distant shores the peaceful billows of the Pacific were rolling in ever-varying and snowy brightness, while farther still, the blue waters of the ocean rose in gradual ascent, until, apparently midway between heaven and earth, they met the sky, in a haziness that rendered either distinguishable from the other, only by the regularity of a scarcely discernible horizon.

To the right and to the left, within a stone's throw of the rock on which we stood, two richly covered pyramidal peaks rose many thousand feet above our heads; while beyond them, on either side, summit after summit of mountains, whose broad bases were planted in the valley below, appeared in long perspective, until, with a semicircular sweep, both chains terminated in the sea by bold and romantic headlands, rendered more picturesque by a partial continuation of detached cliffs and islets. In full view behind was the beautiful valley through which we had ascended, gradually sinking, from the very spot on which we stood, to the now miniature town and port of Honolulu, beyond which again rose "the illimitable sea."

The sublimity of the whole was not a little increased by the almost overwhelming sounds of the trade wind, as it swept along the mountains, which resisted its progress to this narrow pass, and through which it rushed with irresistible velocity and power, bearing in its broad current and whirling eddies, leaves, sand, and even pebbles. Such was the effect of this, that though everything far and near, gleamed in the brightness of a cloudless sky and noonday sun, I could scarce resist the impression that we were standing amid the ragings of a tempest : an illusion not diminished by the harsh screams of the sea-gull and cry of the tropic bird, as they passed us, on rapid wing, to the lofty peaks above, or hastened again to sail in the calmer regions beneath our feet.

None but an atheist could have kept his thoughts from rising to that Being of majesty and of power, who "founded the earth, and hung it upon nothing,"—"who formed the mountains and created the winds,"—"who shut up the sea, and said, hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther ; and here shall thy proud waves be staid." And in the lively contemplation of the marvelous wisdom and omnipotence that overlooks and upholds the mighty wonders of the universe, we could not but feel the force of the humbling interrogative, "O LORD, what is man, that THOU art mindful of him ; or the son of man, that THOU visitest him ?"

After gazing on the various objects of grandeur and beauty by which we were surrounded, till our eyes were fatigued, we made a short descent by a narrow footpath, by which, climbing from rock to rock, and from cliff to cliff, you may reach the plain below. Having gratified our curiosity in this manner, by what I considered a dangerous experiment, we returned to the summit ; and in the cleft of a rock, where we were shielded from the wind, partook of the refreshments we had brought with us.

Before commencing our return to the village, I tried my pencil on the scene, but the merest outline is all I can ever make of the sketch ; to give anything like the distance and the depth necessary to produce the required effect, would demand more than a master's skill.

The battle that decided the fate of Oahu, in the conquests of Kamehameha, and by victory in which he became sole monarch of the group, was fought in the valley leading from Honolulu to this pass. The king of Oahu, after a desperate conflict, fell bravely at the head of his army. Upon which a complete rout ensued. One party of more than three hundred warriors, fled towards this precipice, and were pursued so closely and with such relentless purpose, as to have been plunged, without an exception, from the tremendous offset to the depths below !

Saturday, May 1. At two o'clock this afternoon, I accompanied our highly valued friends, Mr. and Mrs. Bingham, with their children, to the beach, where they embarked on board the whale ship Washington, captain Gardiner, for Kauai.

Monday, 3. By preaching to the English congregation yesterday morning, I commenced the discharge of the regular duties which will devolve on me during my residence here. These duties will be, an English sermon on the morning of every Sabbath ; a sermon in the native language at Waikiki, in the afternoon of the same day ; another at the same place every Wednesday afternoon : the instruction of twenty or thirty native teachers, in reading, writing, and singing three afternoons in the week ; and an attendance with Mr. Ellis every Monday evening, at a meeting for religious conversation with chiefs and people.

The meeting of this kind to-night was opened by a very spirited address, to about a hundred persons present, from the powerful chief Kaahumanu. She was followed in much the same manner by Kalaimoku ; after which, the whole company entered into a free and promiscuous inquiry on the subjects of three regular sermons, that had been preached in the chapel since the preceding Monday. It was encouraging and delightful to see the deep and tender interest with which so large a company, from the very highest to the most obscure of this people, entered on the discussion, and listened to enlargements upon the things of eternity. To be the guides of such, from the darkness and death of paganism, to the light and glory of the religion of the cross, is indeed a happy privilege. The missionary has privations, cares, and sorrows, that no one can know but by experience, and such as often prostrate him in the very dust ; but when successful, he has also a consolation and a joy, and if perseveringly humble, faithful, and devoted, will doubtless meet a reward, which might make even an angel covet his office.

To see, as I have but lately seen, an interesting, intelligent, and youthful chief who but a year ago was a drunken and debauched idolater, but who now gives good evidence of an entire change of character and of heart, come, and, with an expression of the highest benignity and tenderness, exclaim, "aloha, aloha nui, aloha nui loa!" "love to you, great, very great love to you" — while starting tears, and a faltering voice, interrupted farther utterance; and to have the full conviction, that this declaration of his affection arose simply from an overpowering sense of gratitude to the man who had made him acquainted with the words and brought him to the light of eternal life, would be sufficient to make the coldest Christian that ever felt an emotion of genuine piety, the supporter and advocate of missions, and the warm and zealous friend of the heathen.

Monday, May 10. Being all in good health and spirits, we succeeded this morning, soon after breakfast, in forming a party to visit a principal natural curiosity of this island; a lake or pond, in which large quantities of salt are continually forming. The distance to it in a direct line from Honolulu is four miles: but the path we took made the walk about six, before we reached the bank of the lake. Our whole number consisted of nine: H—— and myself, C—— and B——; Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Harwood; Kobert Haia, an islander educated at Cornwall; and two natives, to carry provisions for the day.

We had scarcely passed a hundred rods from the village, before we found something new to admire in the vineyard of Mr. Marini. After crossing a small stream, which bounds it on one side, our path led us the whole length of another. It is well planted and cultivated, and yields grapes sufficient to make considerable quantities of wine. Along the fences in some parts, are bushes of the damask rose in full bloom, which appeared to fine advantage, in contrast with the pale yellow blossoms of the cotton tree, with which they are interspersed. The vineyard is also skirted with pine-apples, in different stages of maturity, from the first swollen pulp to the ripe fruit. Shortly afterwards we crossed what is called the river: the congregated body of fresh water, which makes its way, after passing through the various plantations of the valley, to the sea.

A short distance before it enters the harbor, it is several rods wide, and a number of feet deep; but where we passed it was divided into two streams, and, as we stepped from stone to stone entirely over it, deserves there, at most, only the name of brook. Such are most of the rivers on the Sandwich islands. On leaving this stream, our path led to the west; and for the first mile lay through an uninterrupted succession of kalo plantations.

After passing the kalo ground, we entered on a barren and dreary plain, with scarce a sign of vegetation. This, at the end of two miles, terminated abruptly by an almost perpendicular descent of near a hundred feet into a small but beautifully verdant valley, filled with several large groves of cocoanut trees, and refreshed by two or three cool and babbling streams. On the smooth sward, finely carpeting the grove through which our path led, we partook of some refreshment, and rested during the heat of mid-day. The scenery from this place to the lake, was altogether more interesting than any we had before met. The deep and winding dell through which we pursued our course, was cool and pleasant from the noisy brook that swept under its precipitous banks, and imparted luxuriance to the vegetation with which it was covered. Enormous and misshapen cliffs of dark rock appeared everywhere around us; and on our left for the greater part of the distance, an unbroken ledge, more than a hundred feet high, overhung our heads. The ascent from this ravine was very steep, and on reaching the top we found ourselves at a sufficient elevation to command a view of the greater part of the leeward side of the island, including the port and town of Honolulu; and, immediately before us, the object of our search — the Salt Lake.

This is between two and three miles in circumference, having a few feet of water only in its greatest depth; and from the entire incrustation of its bottom and shores with salt, at the distance at which we first saw it, appeared precisely like a frozen pond in the spring, with the water standing on the snow and ice, before it has become completely broken up. After descending from the hill, we followed the southern shore of the lake for some distance, and collected many beautiful specimens of the salt, as it had formed on twigs, grass, and pebbles, over which the water had flowed. The impregnation of the water, is exceedingly strong, and the crystallization so rapid, that from this natural work alone, immense quantities of salt might be exported. It has no outlet, and is supplied with water by a very small stream from the rocks on the western side.

Besides the supply of salt from this pond, and others of a similar kind, the natives manufacture large quantities from sea water by evaporation. There are in many places along the shore, a succession of artificial vats of clay for this purpose, into which the salt water is let at high tide, and converted into salt by the power of the sun.

On our return we met Kalaimoku and his retinue in the valley of cocoanuts. He had just landed from his barge, having come by water, and expects to remain some days in the vicinity of the lake, to superintend the preparation of four hundred barrels of salt, for a Russian brig now in port. Three dollars are to be given for each barrel. He seemed much pleased, though surprised to meet us, especially H——, on so long a walk; and very politely offered us refreshments of wine, &c. We accepted a melon and a few cocoanuts, the water of which is a favorite beverage, when warm and fatigued.

Before we reached the kalo ground in the valley of Honolulu, the wind had risen, and showers of rain occasionally reached us from the mountains, which were buried in clouds, and we were glad to take the shortest path to the village. In doing this, however, we came near to increasing our fatigue and exposure, for the path led to the deepest and widest part of the river; on reaching which, no one could be prevailed on, though the opposite bank was covered with natives, and their canoes were stowed all along the shore, to ferry us over without a payment in dollars. It was in vain we told them, "of silver and gold have we none;" and after waiting some minutes to see if our evident fatigue and anxiety to cross would not touch the sympathy of some one, we were about taking the only alternative of walking a mile round, when the wife of a young chief, who was one of H——'s pupils in English at Lahaina, happened to come to the bank, and immediately ordered a canoe to bring us over.

Wednesday, May 26. Have just returned from witnessing an affecting scene in the dying moments of the kind and amiable chief, the warm friend and patron of our mission, king Kaumualii! He expired this morning at nine o'clock, after an illness of a fortnight. He was not thought in a dangerous state till within the last day or two. On monday morning he made his will, and yesterday at twelve o'clock became insensible. I visited him almost daily during his sickness, and only on Saturday evening made one of a sad group of friends who followed him, as he was borne on a sofa through a loudly wailing multitude, from a small frame house, in which he was taken ill, to a larger and new one, which had just been completed for Kaahumanu: but even then, I had little thought that he would so soon be in the world of spirits.

Mr. Ellis and myself were sent for, early this morning, to attend him in his dying moments. Mr. Ellis remained about an hour; and as Kaumualii seemed to have revived a little after offering prayer, he returned to the mission house. A few moments only, after he left the room, the king without a struggle breathed his last: and I had the melancholy satisfaction of smoothing his features after the hand of death had passed across them.

The moment it was evident that he was in the very last agony, Kaahumanu ordered the door fastened and the window curtains dropt, and began preparing the corpse for exhibition to the people, who had assembled in multitudes about the house. A Chinese lounge, or settee, was spread with a rich mantle of green silk velvet, lined with pink satin; on this the corpse was laid, the lower extremities being wrapped in loose and heavy folds of yellow satin; while the chest and head were without covering, except a wreath of feathers placed round the head, so as to pass over and conceal the eyes. The splendid war-cloak of the king composed of red, yellow, and black feathers, was spread over the arm of the settee at his head, and a large cape of the same material and colors occupied a corresponding place at his feet. The crowd without had in the meantime received some intimation of the event; and re-doubling their lamentations, were rushing from all directions towards the windows and the doors, so that it was difficult to keep them closed ; as soon therefore as the body was thus laid out, the curtains of the windows in the room were again drawn up, and an indescribable scene of wailing ensued.

The death of scarce any other chief could affect us so deeply and sincerely. My first interview with Kaumualii, the day we arrived at Oahu, inspired me with a feeling of respect that I have scarcely known for another native, except our patroness at Lahaina. He always appeared more civilized, more dignified, more like a Christian, than any of his fellows ; and I can, with the strictest veracity, say of him that which I can hardly do of any other in the nation, that I have never heard from him a word, nor witnessed in him a look or action, unbecoming a prince, or, what is far more to his praise, inconsistent with the character of a professedly pious man. His high features and slightly stooping shoulders, gave him a patrician and venerable look. His manners were easy and gentlemanlike, and as a "royal captive," to those acquainted with his public and private history, he was truly an interesting object. A shade of melancholy was always traceable in his countenance ; and when visiting him, I have often been reminded, by his case, of the early history of the amiable king James the first, of Scotland.

The introduction of the religion of salvation in this perishing land, has not been, as we trust, without everlasting benefit to him. He professed to have the hope of eternal life through the redemption of Christ, and his last days were marked with a peace which we believe to have been that of the righteous man. Mr. Ellis was greatly gratified with his conversations during his illness, until he became insensible. His body is to be carried to Lahaina, to be deposited, at his special request, in the same sepulchre with Keopuolani.

Thursday, 27. Spent this morning with Kaahumanu and the nearest relatives of the deceased, and at their request took a sketch of the corpse as it lay in the full dress of a British hussar. Mr. Ellis succeeded at the same time in getting an excellent profile likeness of the face.

Friday, 23. At nine o'clock this morning all the members of the mission family now at Honolulu, went to the royal residence, to attend religious services before the embarkation of the funeral party. There was a very large assembly of chiefs, foreigners, and common people. At ten o'clock, the coffin, covered with black silk velvet and enveloped in a rich pall of the same material, was carried into the open air in front of the house, in the midst of the encircling crowd. The chiefs, dressed in full mourning, surrounded the coffin: Kaahumanu and Kealiiiahonui taking their seats near the head. The mission family and the foreign residents occupied the verandah, into which the doors and windows of the second story open; while Mr. Ellis and myself stood in the front door below. After a hymn and prayer, Mr. Ellis preached from the words, "Be ye also ready." The services were closed by singing a native version of Pope's "Dying Christian." The corpse was immediately carried on board a pilot-boat, followed by the nearest friends and Mr. Ellis, who accompanies them to Maui. They chose the pilot-boat as the best sailer. Several schooners and brigs, filled with people, followed during the morning. Everything was conducted with the propriety and order of a Christian burial, and testified to the benefits derived from moral and religious instruction.*

* NOTE, (from the first London edition.) The illness of Kaumualii was but short. During its continuance I visited him daily, and engaged some hours of most delightful conversation with him. He was not, even when in perfect health, so loquacious as the generality of the Hawaiians are; and although he was abundantly supplied with every article that could conduce to his comfort, there was not only an habitual dejection on his countenance, but, unless on topics unusually interesting, an apparent aversion to conversation. When he spoke, his words were few, but weighty and judicious. I have every reason to believe he was, in the strictest acceptance of the term, a true Christian; every evidence afforded distinct apprehensions of divine truth, with lively and permanent susceptibility of its influence, and a uniform, upright, honorable, and irreproachable life was furnished by him after he became acquainted with the gospel. The last evening of his life, he observed, with visible satisfaction of mind, that he was resting on Christ, that he thought only and constantly of him, and that he believed he was not by him forgotten. His last hours were remarkably tranquil. I accompanied the chiefs with the corpse to Maui on

Since I have been at this place, I have often made a retired walk on the side of Punch Bowl, or Fort Hill, a place of study in the cool of the morning and evening. As I was walking backward and forward there this afternoon, with a paper in my hand, a small party of natives approached, and charged me with being a wicked man for praying their chiefs to death; that Kaumualii was dead by my prayers; that I was killing Kalaimoku; and soon there would not be a chief left on Oahu. I explained to them their mistake, as to the object of my frequenting that spot, and the inability of any one, by prayer or incantation, to take away the life of another. But they said my words were "falsehood only;" and an old woman hurried off to a quarry, where a number of men were digging stone for a large house Kalaimoku is building, and bade them go and kill me at once, or Kalaimoku would be a dead man. They only laughed at her, however, and Kalaimoku himself, who was near, on his way to see me, joined heartily with them. It seems the place I had thus occupied, was the site of an old idolatrous temple, and of course intimately associated, in the minds of the less enlightened of the people, with the superstitions of the kabu system.

Sabbath evening, 30, nine o'clock. About an hour since, we were alarmed by the ringing of the chapel bell, and on reaching the door, discovered the south end of the building in one entire blaze. Being entirely of grass, in five minutes the whole was on fire, but not until, by the prompt exertions of a few foreigners and natives, every article of any value, such as the bible, lamps, pulpit — which was moveable — window and door frames, and seats, were removed. The loss was trifling, as to real value; the house was very old and shabby, and, to be used at all much longer, would the 28th; and on the 30th, which was the Sabbath, his interment took place at Lahaina, in a style somewhat similar, though less imposing, than that in which Keopuolani's remains had been conveyed to the tomb. Kaumualii and Keopuolani agreed, prior to her decease, that directions should be given to have their bodies deposited side by side together in the grave, that they might rise together in the morning of the resurrection. This was complied with, and the body of Kaumualii was placed by the side of his late departed friend. — William Ellis.

have required rebuilding. The chiefs have determined to build a stone chapel, as soon as Kalaimoku's house is finished ; but to have a house of the kind destroyed by an incendiary, is painful. Suspicion, as to the perpetrator of the deed, has fallen on a drunken man, who was reprovved for improper behaviour during the service this afternoon, and who was heard to threaten to burn the "hale pule," house of prayer. Others say it has been destroyed by way of retaliation for the death of Kaumualii, who they think was the victim of our prayers. Whichever may have been the cause, it originated only with the father of evil. We could not see it sink into ruins without an emotion of sadness, especially as it fell by the hands of baseness. Many of the natives wept aloud, I doubt not with most unfeigned sorrow, and the air was filled with the exclamations, "Aloha ino ! aloha ka hale pule — ka hale O ke Akua ! auwe ! auwe !" "great is my sorrow, great my love for the house of prayer, for the house of God ! alas ! alas !" uttered in most piteous tones. The class of native teachers who are at present under my instruction, were most of them quickly on the ground, and carried all the articles rescued from the fire, within the walls of the mission yard ; they manifested much indignation at the wickedness of the "kanaka naau po" — dark-hearted fellow — who had done the deed.

Monday, 31. Namahana, her husband Laanui, and several of the chiefs, were at the mission house before sunrise this morning, to sympathise with us for the loss of the chapel. They design punishing the culprit, if he can be discovered, and have already given orders for the erection of a new and larger house of worship, without any suggestion of the propriety or necessity of it, from us.

Monday, June 7. After the monthly prayer-meeting with the natives, H—— called with me this afternoon to see a young American sailor who is very ill, and who I have visited regularly for some time past. He is one of the many infatuated beings who desert their ships to wander among the licentious inhabitants of the islands, without a home, and with scarce a subsistence. He suffers exceedingly, and is entirely destitute of every comfort : his bed is a dirty mat spread on the ground, with a piece of native cloth for a covering, and a block of wood for a pillow.

We do all in our power to prevent his suffering for want of medicine, food, and necessary attentions ; but we have become so familiar with sights of misery, which we cannot even attempt to alleviate, that we are often compelled to turn from them with a sigh, and banish them as quickly as possible from our recollection. We dwell in a land of disease and death, and, in many respects, of inconceivable corruption and horror. This lad, like many others who live at ease in sin while their health and strength are continued, now that he is in a situation of agony and of danger, is overwhelmed with guilt and shame, and with trembling and tears supplicates the counsel and the prayers, which in other circumstances he would have disregarded, and perhaps scorned.

Such are to be pitied, to be instructed, and to be tenderly and fervently prayed for ; but I doubt whether any one can discharge the duty without the lively fear that if they recover, their tears and their penitence will be only as the morning cloud and early dew.

Tuesday, 8. It is quite sickly among the natives at present. Two chief women died on Sunday ; one here, and one at Waikiki ; and from the daily wailing heard in various directions, it is probable there are many deaths among the common people. Before breakfast this morning, Namahana and Laanui, with their retinue, called for me to accompany them to the funeral of the chief at Waikiki.

After a cup of coffee we set off, and even the object of our excursion, and the deep mourning dresses of most of the party, did not suppress a smile, provoked by the appearance we made when brought in the scope of a single coup d'œil. The queen, seated on a mat, completely filled the body of the small wagon in which she rode. She was drawn by a pony, which, in size and weight, could stand no comparison with her majesty ; while Robert Haia, perched on the foreboard, immediately over the little horse, acted as charioteer. Laanui, who is a tall stout young man, bestrode a nag equally sorry and diminutive in his appearance as the one in harness, but far more restless and stubborn in his movements, without saddle or bridle, except one of twisted grass ; his feet, while not engaged in beating the ribs of his beast, dangling just above the surface of the ground. He was richly and fashionably dressed, but, for the benefit of the air, in the labor of his arms, legs, and feet, necessary in the management of his horse, or from a fear of injuring it by a fall, he had committed an elegant cap of velvet and gold to an attendant and rode bareheaded. Three or four of the native teachers, in good American clothes, but most wretchedly mounted, kept him company; while a large number of servants, covered only by a few dirty strips of native cloth, scampered along, some behind and some before, on horses as shabby and uncivilized as their riders.

My charger was the mission horse; a raw-boned, high-hipped, long, lean old animal, quite characteristic of the whole establishment. You can readily imagine that this escort of horsemen to the royal equipage—some of the horses kicking and running, while the ragged kapas and long hair of the riders were streaming in the air, others balking and backing, and others again standing in stubborn fixedness in spite of whipping and goading,—made no common spectacle: especially when viewed in connection with a large train of attendants, in every color and variety of drapery, bearing Chinese umbrellas of yellow and crimson damask, different colored kahiles, calabashes of refreshments, tobacco pipes, and spittoons; some running and hooting after the carriage of their mistress, and others standing in silent admiration of the skill of the horsemen and the various tempers of the beasts.

On reaching the settlement, the coffin was still unfinished; and I improved the necessary delay in visiting a large hei-au, which had often attracted my attention, situated about a mile above the bay and groves of Waikiki, immediately under the promontory of Diamond Hill. It seems well placed for the cruel and sanguinary immolations of the heathen, standing far from every habitation, and being surrounded by a wide extent of dark lava, partially decomposed, and slightly covered with an impoverished and sunburnt vegetation. It is the largest and most perfect ruin of the idolatry of the islands I have yet seen; and was the most distinguished temple in Oahu. By a rough measurement, I made its length forty, and its breadth twenty yards. The walls, of dark stone, are perfectly regular and well built, about six feet high, three feet wide at the foundation, and two feet at the top. It is enclosed only on three sides, the oblong area formed by the walls being open on the west; from this side there is a descent by three regular terraces or very broad steps, the highest having five small kou trees planted upon it at regular distances from one another.

A native, of whom I had inquired on the beach the direct path to the hei-au, and who had obligingly offered his services as a guide, gave me an explanation of some of the rites of the former system, interspersing his statement every few moments with an emphatic "aole maikai," "naau po!" "no good," "dark-hearted!"

Pieces of cocoanut shells and fragments of human bones, both the remains of offerings to false gods, or rather to demons, were discoverable in different parts of the area, and forcibly hurried the mind back to the times of superstitious horror now gone, as we firmly believe, from this interesting people forever. It was at this place that ten men were doomed to be sacrificed about twenty years since, for the recovery of our late patroness Keopuolani, then dangerously ill in the neighboring groves of Waikiki. It was her happy destiny, before her death, to see a bright and glorious day dawn on the gloom that overshadowed her birth and rested on her riper years; and eventually, herself to become the blessed recipient, as we trust, of all the riches of eternal grace.

As far as my knowledge of the language would permit, I endeavored to direct the attention of my companion to the glories of this latter day, to the only acceptable sacrifice, the Lamb made ready from the foundation of the world, and to convince him of the necessity of a life of holiness, and of loving and worshipping the only true God.

The terraces of the hei-au command a beautiful prospect of the bay and plantations of Waikiki, of the plain and village of Honolulu—rendered more picturesque by the lofty embankments of Fort Hill on one side, and the tall masts of the shipping on the other—and still farther in the back ground, of the dark eminences in the vicinity of the Salt Lake, and the picturesque chain of mountains that form the north-western boundary of the island. The view to the east is of a perfectly different character, presenting nothing but the precipitous projections and shelvings of the indescribably rude promontory of Diamond Hill. This, on the side next the hei-au, is entirely inaccessible, and though it is without a single germ of vegetation in its whole extent from top to bottom, a space of many hundred feet, is still one of the most imposing and beautiful features in the scenery of Oahu.

Shortly after I reached Waikiki again, the funeral service, consisting of a hymn, prayer, and address, was performed in a beautiful grove of cocoanut trees. Many hundred natives were present, and after giving a respectful attention to the services, followed the corpse to the grave in a regular procession.

Saturday, 12. Our friends, Mr. Elwell and Mr. Hunnewell having trained their horses to the harness, politely called for H—— and the children to take an evening airing in one of the coaches recently brought from America. The plain affords a beautiful drive, but we little thought, on our first arrival, so soon to see it enlivened and ornamented by so neat and genteel an equipage.

Tuesday, 15. The morning promising a pleasant day, it was determined at breakfast, that we should visit the mountains, once more to enjoy the retirement and sweetness of woodland scenery. Our party consisted of H——, C—— and B——; young Mr. Halsey of New-York; Robert Haia, and myself, with Henry, a young English sailor, living in the mission family, and two or three native boys, to carry refreshments.

We left home at half past nine o'clock. For the first mile, in crossing the plain to the north, and passing under and around the western side of Fort Hill, we met nothing but the objects of our daily observation. At about that distance from the village, we crossed a stone wall, which secures the plantations of the valley from the depredations of the herds and flocks feeding on the plain, which is a common: and, for another mile, made our way through a succession of kalo plantations, by a path so narrow as to require a cautious step to avoid falling, either on one side or the other, into the water and mire in which that vegetable grows.

The first entire novelties we met, were a couple of tamarind trees, the property of Mr. Marini. The tamarind is among the most beautiful of the larger productions of tropical climates. The trees were covered with blossoms of a light yellow, tinged and sprinkled with red, and with fruit in every stage of growth, from the bud to that which was perfectly ripe.

As we proceeded up the valley, the ground became more uneven and picturesque, and the variety and luxuriance of vegetation rapidly increased. At the distance of two miles from the village, the hills near us began to be clothed with shrubbery and trees, and the air became sensibly more cool and sweet: a note from a bird also occasionally reached the ear, while the babblings of the water-courses, leading from one kalo bed to another, and from one side of the valley to the other, were exchanged for the heavy rumbling of the mountain torrent. After an hour's walk, the valley had diminished from a half to a quarter of a mile in width, and instead of the gentle swellings of the hills at its entrance, our path was overhung by mountains, almost perpendicular, and covered with a variety of the richest and most beautiful foilage, interspersed with bold ledges or single projections of rock dripping with moisture, and gracefully mantled by vines and creepers, growing in all the brightness and luxuriance of perennial verdure.

At half past eleven o'clock, we reached the head of the glen, a place where it branches into two narrow ravines, one on each side of a mountain jutting from the east. We here found a delightful resting spot, in a clump of lime trees planted by Mr. Marini. They are eight in number, and stand in a recess of rocks in such a manner, as to form a large and beautiful arbor, impenetrable to the sun, and filled with the fragrance of the blossoms and fruit of the trees.

We remained two hours at this spot, during which I secured the outlines of two or three of the most striking scenes around us, a sketch of our bower among the rest. I will send one of these, to illustrate this part of my journal.

After a cup of coffee, we prepared to ascend the mountain immediately on the east, by far the most arduous part of the excursion, our path being an uninterrupted but winding ascent, of the steepness of an ordinary staircase, for near two miles, through the thickets and cliffs, which had been so much the objects of our admiration, from below. About three o'clock we reached the summit, and found ourselves more than a thousand feet perpendicularly above the place of our refreshment, and not less than three thousand above the level of the sea, surrounded by scenery as enchanting as it was novel and picturesque. Not an object, simply natural, was wanting for the perfection of woodland beauty in the spot where we stood; while near, and apparently on a level with us, almost on every side, were the narrow ridges and pyramidal peaks, which but the hour before we had seen intercepting the clouds, that were hurried along by an impetuous trade wind. The valley, too, through which we had passed, lay like a map at our feet, the ocean looked like a blue wall built around us, to the skies, while the old fortified crater near Hono-lulu, was scarce distinguishable from the level of the plain; and Diamond Hill, an object approaching to sublimity in almost every extensive view we had before enjoyed on this island, though still conspicuous and beautifully unique, was so diminished and softened by height and distance, as to appear only like the dark ruins of some stately castle jutting into the sea.

The whole forcibly reminded me of the descriptive correctness and spirit of an effusion of one of our American bards. Had the author himself been of our party, I believe he would have forgotten the ramble and the objects which first elicited it, and, enraptured by the picture now before him, in the enthusiasm of a fresh inspiration, would, with me, have exclaimed —

OAHU! — In thy mountain scenery yet,
 All we admire of nature in her wild
 And frolic hour of infancy is met,
 And never has a summer morning smil'd
 Upon a lovelier scene, than the full eye
 Of the enthusiast revels on — where high
 Amidst the forest solitudes, he climbs
 O'er crags, that proudly tower above the deep,

And knows that sense of danger which sublimes
 The breathless moment — when his daring step
 Is on the verge of the cliff, and he can hear
 The low dash of the wave with startled ear ; —
 In such an hour he turns — and on his view
 Ocean — and earth — and heaven burst before him.
 Clouds slumbering at his feet, and the clear blue
 Of summer's sky, in beauty bending o'er him.

From this place we turned our steps homeward, by a path leading directly along the top of the mountain, as it stretches towards the sea, and gradually softens down to the level of the plain at a distance of three or four miles. In several places, there was barely room for us to pass, one by one, on the very ridge of the mountain, while on either side there was an almost perpendicular descent of many hundred feet. We were surrounded by a variety of beautiful shrubs and flowers of most exuberant growth. The brake was of astonishing size. I never saw any in America more than two or three feet high, but here its long leaves nodded gracefully over our heads, and in many places arched and overshadowed our path. It was near six o'clock when we reached home ; but we felt much less fatigue than we could have expected, and were more delighted by the excursion than we had even hoped to be.

The only trees and plants known to us, which we saw, and which I have not yet mentioned, were the koa, — an acacia — a large and beautiful tree of dark hard wood, of which the canoes of the natives are formed. The ohia, — eugenia malaccensis — bearing a beautifully tufted crimson flower, and a fruit called by foreigners, the native apple, from its resemblance to our fruit of that name, juicy and refreshing, but rather insipid to the taste ; and the castor tree, — palma christi. Of fruits, besides the tamarind, Malacca apple, and prickly pear — cactus ficus indicus — which grows to a large size here, we met with the banana, plantain, lime, lemon, pine-apple, and musk and water melons ; and saw of vegetables, potatos, principally the sweet, though some few common American or Irish, yam, kalo, pumpkin, cabbage, Indian corn, onion, bean, cucumber. Also pepper, ginger, mustard, and tobacco.

The bread-fruit is one of the finest of our vegetables. A full-grown tree is about the size of an ordinary hickory in America, or an ash in England. The fruit, when flourishing, is larger than a pine-apple, and more circular in its shape; when perfectly ripe, its color becomes yellowish, and its taste sweet, but not pleasant. We eat it before it is ripe, when it is a light green color. The outer coat, or peel, is thin but hard, though not shining like the rind of a melon, and is entirely covered with slightly marked, and small pentagonal sections. It is cooked, by throwing it directly from the tree, upon a bed of coals, or into the blaze of a fire. The outer coat immediately becomes charred, while the inner parts only roast like a potato. When cooked through, the rind is easily removed, leaving a beautiful light-colored, smoking loaf. Its general consistence is that of a fine Irish potato, but more spongy, and towards the centre, quite porous. In taste it is very like the hard-boiled yolk of an egg.

Tuesday 22. The ship Sultan, captain Clark, of Boston, last from the North-west coast of America, came to anchor in the roads this morning. Shortly after, I received a note from the consul, requesting me to attend the funeral of a passenger, who had died on board the day she made the islands. His name is Prescott, first officer of brig Frederick, of Boston, which has been sold on the Spanish coast, and her captain and crew brought to the islands by the Sultan. There was a very respectable attendance; the procession moving from the consulate, where the religious services were performed. It will be a consolation to the friends of him thus called into the world of spirits, far from the tender sympathies of home, to know that he has found a resting place, though in a heathen land, near a Christian chapel, and not in the dreary caverns of the deep.

June 23. Were you sitting with us this evening, my dear M——, you would scarce believe yourself in the torrid zone, and that too in midsummer. The wind howls around us as boisterously, if not as coldly, as it does through the colonnades of your own mansion, when a northern storm sweeps down the lake on a winter's night; and we have been obliged to close all our doors and windows, and resort to woollen garments, to keep us comfortable. The whole day has been blustering, gloomy, and wet, similar to the weather of March in America, and such as in this climate, especially at Lahaina, is seldom known. There is a heavy swell of the ocean from the south, and the high surf occasioned by it, though near a mile distant, has been the object of constant attraction from its varying beauty and tumult. The interest of the scene in this direction, is much increased by the appearance of the Sultan, still outside of the reef. She labors at her anchor in the violence of the gale, with a stateliness of motion becoming the proud name she bears.

There has been so much of a tempest at sea, that governor Adams, who sailed for the windward on Saturday, returned this morning with the loss of a topmast and yards.

Thursday, 15. Mr. and Mrs. Ellis having become partially established in a new stone cottage, gave a special invitation to the mission family to spend the day with them. We were happy indeed to see our valued friends so comfortably accommodated — after having been subjected for eighteen months to great inconvenience, from the want of a suitable residence — rendered doubly desirable by the extreme ill health of Mrs. Ellis.

Seated at table with none but dear companions and confidential friends near us, we could almost fancy ourselves again at a family party at home; and in the illusion, for a moment find a melancholy pleasure. After the cloth was removed, we passed the afternoon in listening with lively interest to the journal of the deputation which explored the island of Hawaii last summer, and which Mr. Ellis is preparing for the public. We also again examined the drawings which are to accompany the work, copies of which I have made to accompany the manuscript for the American Board. The originals will go to the London Missionary Society.

After tea we held the customary weekly prayer meeting of the mission family; when Mr. Ellis gave a warm and affecting address from the words, "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name!" — "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits!" in which he recounted the various dealings of Providence towards himself and family, since his arrival in the islands, and testified to the unfailing goodness, mercy, and faithfulness of God. Many circumstances conduced to make the hour deeply interesting; we felt the high and holy ties by which we were united to each other; and could any one have looked in upon us, while the lively sympathies of our hearts entered into all the feelings of our associates, though strangers till we met on pagan ground, he might with truth have exclaimed, "Behold how these Christians love one another!"

"Lone exiles, on these northern isles, Placed far amid the melancholy main,"

it is a happiness inconceivable to any one not of our number, or in a similar situation, to meet here those we can tenderly love; and to find in them the refinement, the intelligence, and the piety, which in any place give the highest zest to the enjoyments of social life.

CHAPTER XII.

Mission house at Honolulu, Friday, 16. Dined to-day at the residence of Capt. Ebbetts, of New-York, in company with Mr. Crocker, American consul; Mr. Small, a Scotch gentleman, recently from South America; Mr. Bruce and Mr. Halsey, of New-York; Mr. and Mrs. Ellis; and Mr. and Mrs. Loomis, and H—, of the mission.

Tuesday, 20. This evening, at 8 o'clock, Kalaimoku sent to request us to attend prayers with himself and household at his new house, in which he sleeps for the first time to-night. We passed a happy hour with him, and consider the circumstance a strong evidence of the interest he takes, and the importance he attaches, to the exercises of family worship.

This building will bear, at the Sandwich islands at least, the name of palace. It is of stone, plastered and whitened, two and a half stories high, sixty-four feet in front, and forty in depth; and externally, except in the roof, is not unlike Mr. J. Fenimore Cooper's house, at Fenimore, as seen across the water by you, from the Lakelands. The second story, the front doors and windows of which open on a covered piazza or verandah, is that in which the regent will live. It consists of one very large apartment in front, upwards of fifty feet long, and proportionably wide, designed for a saloon, in which to entertain strangers — commanding, from its elevation, a fine view of the island and ocean — and a small neat room at one end for a cabinet, to be furnished with an escritoir, &c. The rest of the floor is divided into sleeping rooms for himself and one or two confidential attendants.

The expense of the building, exclusive of the stone, is estimated at six thousand dollars. It stands in an enclosure of several acres, which is to be planted, and kept in a state of cultivation. The whole establishment will give quite a new aspect to Honolulu, from whatever point it is viewed.

Kaahumanu has also had a new house built during the year; it is of wood, and was prepared in all its parts for erection, before it was brought from America. It is well papered and painted, and, in its dimensions and general appearance, similar to some of the best wooden houses at Cooperstown. These two buildings, with the consulate, which is also a two-story frame house, a smaller one belonging to Kaahumanu, and the two mission houses, give quite an European aspect to the town; and while they render it more picturesque, by the contrast with the native huts, afford evidence of the civilization to which the nation is approaching.

21. This morning the ship Jupiter, Capt. Leslie, of New-York, anchored in the roads: and in the evening, most of our friends in the village, to the number of fifteen, including Capt. Leslie, took tea with us.

Monday, Aug. 9. Yesterday morning, at day-break, B—— tapped at our door, to announce the arrival of the long anxiously expected Tamaahmaah of New-York. Capt. Meek politely sent up one letter before breakfast, and a packet of twenty-five or thirty, in time to be read in the evening.

Tuesday night, Aug. 10. We had just completed every preparation this afternoon, for our return to Maui to-morrow, in the Tamaahmaah, and were making a farewell visit to our friends Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, when the pilot-boat New-York, was seen approaching the harbor from Kauia. She had scarce come to anchor outside the reef, when, instead of welcoming Kalaimoku and Mr. and Mrs. Bingham, as we had expected, the whole town, as well as our families, was thrown into agitation, by the cry of "ua Kaua! — ua Kaua!" — "it is war! — it is war!" — the intelligence of a rebellion and battle at that island, and of the necessary desertion of the station at Waimea by Mr. Bingham and Mr. Whitney, for the safety of themselves and families, having been brought by the schooner.

G. P. Tamoree is at the head of the insurgents; they attacked the fort at day-break on Sabbath morning, and it was with difficulty saved; and not till ten of the assailants and six of the government party were killed. Kalaimoku, immediately after the repulse of the rebels, a part of whose plan was to cut him off at the same time they seized the fort, sent for the missionaries, to return thanks to God with him, for his deliverance; to inform them that the pilot-boat would sail immediately to Oahu for assistance; and to urge their departure with their families by the opportunity, assuring them that he would protect them with his life, as long as he lived, but intimating a fear that, from the weakness of the party with him, they might all perish.

Our friends have suffered much from the horrors of the scene they witnessed at the storming of the fort, and on their visit to it after the battle, while it was yet filled with the bodies of the slain, and echoing with the groans of the wounded and dying; much from anxiety for the safety of Kalaimoku; and much from fatigue and privation, having embarked without taking any refreshment, or preparing anything for the voyage, which has been forty-eight hours long. They were all completely drenched with the surf, in getting off in a canoe to the schooner, and had not the means of changing the clothes even of the two infants with them.

The evening has been one of intense interest, while we have listened to the narrative of our friends; and rendered devout thanksgiving, that they have been brought safely to our arms from amid "the ragings of the people," and the scenes of death.

One of the rebel chiefs, a fine-looking young man, was made captive when his party were repulsed. He requested to be shot; but was bound hand and foot, according to a custom of the country, and carried on board the pilot-boat. Mr. Bingham saw him in the evening after they had put to sea, seated against the timbers of the vessel in her main hold. In the morning, the prisoner was gone; and on inquiry, the captain, without speaking, but by very significant pantomime, made known his fate: he had been thrown overboard in the dead of the night, with his cords upon him, when midway between Kauai and Oahu! This is the manner in which, since the abolition of the kabu, those guilty of high offences against the government, have generally been despatched. In the period of idolatry, they were devoted in sacrifice to the gods.

A thousand men are already ordered to be prepared to embark, at sunrise to-morrow morning, for the relief of Kalaimoku; and scarce anything is heard but the rolling of the drum and the discharging of muskets, by way of trying their fitness for use. Chiefs and people have entered fully into the spirit of the occasion; no one is to be seen without some of the insignia belli, — caps, feathers, cartridge boxes, swords or muskets, while every step and every look is en militaire.

Thursday, Aug. 12 — on board the brig Tamaahmaah. Yesterday morning, at sunrise, a messenger from Capt. Ebbetts and Capt. Meeks informed us that the Tamaahmaah would sail for Maui immediately after breakfast. At nine o'clock, after having parted with our friends at a throne of grace, we came on board, accompanied by Mr. Bingham, Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Chamberlain. At 11, they left us with the pilot, the brig having gained the open sea; after which we fired a salute, and filled away with a fresh breeze. There never was a finer day. Under a cloud of bellying canvass, our rapid bark leapt from billow to billow, dashing every opposing wave in banks of foam, back upon the deep, while the sportings of the porpoises, the hurried motions of the flying-fish, and the bright beauty of the dolphin below, and the lofty soarings and shrill cry of the tropic bird above, hurried our recollections through the voyage of two oceans.

We had the prospect of making a very short passage, but at eight o'clock, were becalmed off the south-west point of Lanai, where we still are. The delay is unpleasant, but with the elegant accommodations of the brig, and the polite attentions of the gentlemen to whom we are indebted for a passage, we do not feel impatient. All the windward islands are now in sight. Immediately before us, at a distance of eight or ten miles, are the lofty precipices of Kohola on Lanai; still further to the north, the more elevated summits of Molokai appear, with Oahu in the distance, almost lost in a bed of light and graceful clouds. On the east is Maui, more romantic in its outline than any of the others — and on the south, Kahulawe, far behind which, rise the sublime mountains of Hawaii.

Ten o'clock at night. We are still on board the Tamaahmaah, the calm having continued till within the last three hours. The disappointment of not spending the night at our home, has been more than made up by the uncommon loveliness of the evening, while a fresh and balmy breeze hurries us forward with animating rapidity. A full moon riding through a sky more serene and lucid than is often seen in ruder latitudes, throws shades of softness and beauty over the wild features of the islands, and crowns every heaving billow with a silver crest. The ship's company presents one of the happier sketches of sea-life. The courses are hauled up, that the helmsman may steer by a landmark on the top of the mountains overhanging Lahaina, which leaves the view of the whole deck unobstructed. The captain and officers are silently walking their respective stations, while an occasional loud laugh and exclamation from the fore-castle, signify the manner in which the watch below are enjoying their partial release from duty. The rest of the crew are variously grouped — some leaning over the bows, watching the dashing of the waves, as they are furrowed by our bark, or the transient illumination of the water by a sudden movement of one of the larger inhabitants of the deep — others are lounging on the gun-wales or against the long-boat, while a still greater number are mounted on their favorite station, the windlass. One of these last is playing with skill and taste on a clarinet, in which he is accompanied by three or four good voices, singing many of the more modern and fashionable songs, occasionally relieved, perhaps by way of kindly remembrance of former scenes and distant friends, by one or two verses of "Auld lang syne."

This may be called a domestic scene at sea, and answers to the happy fireside at home, when the business, the duties, and the cares of the day, give place to the indulgences of a leisure hour and the joys of social life. I could not contemplate it, without admiring the wisdom and the goodness of God to all his creatures, in denying to none the common sources of contentment and happiness, and in so constituting man, that all the ordinary situations of life have pleasures and joys for those to whose lot they fall. But, though interesting and pleasant, it has not been like some of the happy evenings at sea we once knew, whilst floating on the bosom of the Pacific. No, I have no reason to believe that the Spirit of God is specially here — but the decks of the Thames did, at least at times, give evidence of his presence.

Saturday, Aug. 14. After breakfast yesterday morning, we once more entered our humble habitation, and met the warm embraces of our beloved associates Mr. and Mrs. Richards. Lahaina never before appeared so beautiful: nothing but necessity could induce me to exchange the fresh sea breeze and foaming surf that rolls almost into our door, for a residence near the dusty plain and stagnant marshes and fish ponds about the mission house at Honolulu. Notwithstanding this, Oahu is unquestionably the most fertile and most beautiful of the islands, and from the constant prevalence of the trade winds, is among the most healthy.

The state of the people here, in reference to spiritual things, was never more interesting than at present. The chiefs are making rapid advances in religious knowledge, and the subject of salvation is evidently taking the highest place in the hearts and thoughts of many of the most powerful persons in the nation. For many of these we feel a strong personal attachment: and you yourself, my dear M——, would with us love them, could you but see them as they are. Their looks of affection and gratitude to us — the starting tear, at the open and almost daily declaration, “ We do love the work of God, we do love Jehovah and Jesus Christ, we do rejoice in this day of light, this time of good tidings and of salvation,” &c. &c. would melt a less tender heart, would touch a less susceptible bosom than belongs to my sister. If we do not find in the scenery of the islands all the variety and beauty of an American landscape; if we most sensibly feel the loss of our friends, and with them the elegance, the refinement, and intelligence, of civilized society; if we are daily conscious of a tenderness and intensity of affection for you and for many we most love, which we cannot describe — still we are happy in our work, and would not leave it without a call in providence, the most clear and indubitable.

Sept. 6. From a mistake in the calculation of time, or from some other cause, this day instead of the 17th inst. has been considered by the prince and princess, as the anniversary of the death of their mother Keopuolani. And has been distinguished, according to the former customs of the people, by a festival, to which we were invited. We witnessed the commencement of it, partly from curiosity and partly from respect to the prince and princess; but finding that the whole arrangements were under the direction of persons least calculated to conduct them with propriety, and perceiving that the more innocent ceremonies were giving place to songs and dances of licentiousness, evidently offensive to the more enlightened of the chiefs and people themselves, we took our leave with feelings of grief that the memory of one they so justly honored, should be perpetuated by scenes of dissipation and debauchery. Many thousand persons were assembled to witness the celebration and to join in the most heathenish part of it. The place selected for the occasion was the very spot where she died, the grove in which she had so often worshipped God, and from which, after the exercises of a Christian burial, she was conveyed to the mansions of the dead.

The spectators, forming an immense mob, were kept several rods from the low fence inclosing the grove, by sentinels and a file of armed men, leaving an open passage to the gate of a fort recently erected a few rods distant. When we reached the grove at 11 o'clock, the processions were nearly ready to move, the principal chiefs, Kaahumanu, Hoapili-Wahine, &c. were there, but without any preparation of dress, for which they gave the reason that it was only "the play of children," referring to Nahienaena and the prince.

A long mahogany table, with circular ends, was spread, and well set with china and glass, for thirty persons, having sofas covered with purple at the head and foot for the princess and her brother. The rest of the seats were large crimson chairs from Canton. Behind the sofa of the little girl, fine mats, covered with beautiful native cloth, of a variety of colors, were spread, on which Nahienaena and the queens were to be set down from the processions. Eight fine looking men, in the best style of the native costume, stood around, each bearing a kahile, about thirty feet high, and two feet in diameter at the feathered end, of crimson, green, black, and white feathers. On the north side of the table was a platform, two feet high and thirty feet long, covered with a vast quantity of native cloth; on which also a kind of throne was formed in the middle, as another seat of honor for the princess. At a short distance from the table, on the south side, the stewards and servants, amounting to fifty or sixty persons, were regularly arranged, with immense quantities of provision, in calabashes handsomely ornamented with green vines and leaves, nets and tassals, of white, crimson, green and yellow cord.

Groups of dancing and singing females, including many hundreds, surrounded the grove, to whom the servants and others within the enclosure sung in response. Kinau, a daughter of Kamehameha, and one of the queens of Liholiho, was the first important personage, having a part in the sports, who made her appearance. She was wrapped in such quantities of native cloth, as not to be able to move a step without assistance: having a supporter on each side and a number of attendants preceding and following her, bearing the ends of her drapery. As soon as she was seated, Kekauonohi, another of the queens of Liholiho, came very much in the same manner; after which the gates of the fort were thrown open, when the prince, preceded by a guard and drum, appeared in a handsome suit of purple cloth, trimmed with gold, and wearing a dirk. Next to him came a young female chief, singing and dancing, dressed with much taste in the native style; and immediately after, the princess, also, in a native dress, seated on native cloth, of more than a hundred thicknesses, and borne on the shoulders of a dozen of her chief men. She was shielded from the sun by lofty Chinese umbrellas of rich damask, and surrounded and followed by several of the larger kahiles, as the insignia of her dignity. She was thus carried from the fort to the grove several different times, after slight alterations in her dress and attendants, while the air rung with the shouts of the multitude and with songs in her praise. Many became much intoxicated before they left the table, which was not until five o'clock. All the chiefs, of whose religious character we entertain a favorable opinion, fully condemned the proceedings of this day. Many of them were evidently dispirited by them, but said, "The prince and princess had no superiors, and could not be controlled in their amusements."

Saturday. 11. On the 7th inst. all the chief women, except the governess Wahine Pio, the queen Kekauonohi, and the princess, left Lahaina for Kailua, on a visit to governor Adams. The news of the war at Kauai, and the absence of the most powerful rulers, have excited in the farmers and common people throughout the district a more general spirit of drunkenness than at any time since our arrival among them. For the last few days, by far the greater portion of the whole population have been in a state of intoxication; and given up night and day to gambling, riot, and fighting, and every species of revelry. Almost the whole of our scholars have been sent to Kauai, as soldiers, or taken off to Hawaii; so that, just at present, we are in rather discouraging circumstances.

Drunkenness is one of the most common vices of the people. Intoxicating liquors are imported in large quantities; but the principal means of indulgence among the inhabitants in general, is a species of rum, the production of rude distilleries of their own, and a fermented liquor of inebriating quality, which they manufacture from the sugarcane, the sweet potato, and the baked root of the dracæna, an article exceedingly saccharine, and capable of being formed into a very strong beer. For the art of distillation, and for that of brewing also, the islanders were early indebted, I believe, to the skill and vicious thirst of two or three citizens of Port Jackson, who found it convenient to exchange the place of their exile; and secured a passage from Botany Bay to Hawaii.

It is scarce possible for the inhabitants of a civilized country to imagine the scenes presented at one of these periods of general inebriation, when men, women, and children are everywhere met, under all the wild excitement of liquor; especially when to this state is added the singing, dancing, shouting, and fighting of heathenism.

At the present time, a favorite sport, moku-moku, or boxing, has been revived. It is a national game, regulated by established principles; to secure an adherence to which, managers and umpires are appointed, who preside over it and determine points of dispute. The champions usually belong to different chiefs, and enter the ring inspired by a pride of clanship as well as by the ambition of personal distinction. When one has been prostrated so as to yield the contest, the victor paces the circle with an air of defiance, challenging any other to a trial of strength and skill; and thus, in the course of half an hour, a dozen may successively lose an ultimate triumph, by being themselves knocked down by some combatant of greater tact or muscular power, who at last clears the arena.

A well directed blood starting or leveling blow is followed by unbounded applause from the surrounding multitude, testified in the most appropriate manner, by yells and shouts of barbarity, that make the whole welkin ring; while the tossing of thousands of arms into the air, jumping, dancing, and clapping of hands, prolong the expression of delight.

These boxing matches often lead to wagers among the spectators, and not unfrequently end in violence and death. At almost every shout from the ring, the natives of our household exclaim, "Kaha! kaka! mamuli make!" "Ah! ah! by and by murder!"—and inform us that many are killed in the moku-moku; and that only a few years ago, forty men were murdered at one time, on the very spot now occupied by the exhibition.

The games which are the principal means of gambling, and at which the natives spend much of their time, are chiefly, the ulu maika, the pahe, the konane, and the puhenehene. The two first are similar to each other in their principles. The ulu maika consists of the bowling, by two individuals or parties, of a circular, flat, and highly polished stone, two or three inches in diameter and an inch thick, swelling with a slight convexity from the edges to the centre. The art consists in sending the stone, so as to pass between two short sticks driven in the ground near to each other, at the greatest distance, or in the driving of one party by the other, by bowling the stone farthest. In the pahe, short blunted darts, of very hard and highly polished wood, from two to four feet long, are used in a similar manner, instead of the stone. The konane is a kind of drafts, played with small black and white stones, on a board marked with a great number of squares. It appears to be an intricate and tedious game. The puhenehene is on the principle of the childish amusement of hiding the slipper; and the art, on the one side, consists in hiding a stone so adroitly, in the full gaze of all present, under one of five loose bundles of native cloth, placed on the ground between the parties for this purpose, as to lead to a mistake in the guess of the seeker for it; and on the other side, of so close a watch of all the muscular motions of the arm, chest, and shoulder, in the individual secreting the stone, as to lead to a discovery of the withdrawing of the hand from it, and thus to a knowledge of the kapa under which it lies. The two last games are played principally by the chiefs, and in them, the single wagers of Liholiho have sometimes risen to forty, eighty, and even four hundred dollars. The common people not unfrequently become so much excited at games of the ulu maika and pahe, that the greater number of thousands collected around, will be themselves betting on the different parties; though in doing it, hundreds stake the very last article they possess in the world, even to the malo or pau they are wearing at the time.

Wednesday, 16. The state of things referred to in the preceding paragraphs, continued to become more and more dreadful, until the governess herself, who has never been very friendly to our object, felt it necessary to interpose with the arm of her power. On Saturday afternoon, when the boxing matches threatened every moment to lead to scenes of unrestrained violence and murder, and stones and clubs began already to thicken in the air, she ordered an armed band from the fort to disperse the people by musket and bayonet; and immediately afterwards, heralds were sent through the district to proclaim a law against all farther drinking of rum or beer, against all boxing and fighting, and against every breach of the Sabbath, on penalty of the displeasure of the government, and a fine of a hundred dollars for each offence. Since which, the whole settlement has been in perfect order and quietude.

Monday, 20. For some time past the chiefs have expressed their determination to have instruction in reading and writing extended to the whole population; and have only been waiting for books, and an increase in the number of suitably qualified native teachers, to put the resolution, as far as practicable, into effect. A knowledge of this having reached some of the maka ainana, or farmers of Lahaina, who did not enter into the recent dissipation, including the tenants of our own plantation, application was made by them to us for books and slates, and an instructor; and the first school, consisting of about thirty individuals, ever formed among that class of the people, has within a few days been established in our enclosure, under the superintendence of B——, who is quite familiar with the native tongue.

This event we regard as very important: believing that the introduction of books and slates among the common people, will prove, as it did among the chiefs, the most effectual means of withdrawing them from their idle and vicious habits: and of bringing them more readily under the influence of our teachings in morality and religion.

Thursday, 23. The leading female chiefs returned on Saturday from Hawaii, and sailed again this morning for Kauai, to visit Kalaimoku, who has been successful in putting down the insurrection ; and has called a council of the chiefs to sanction his arrangements for the future government of that island. George Tamoree, who has escaped death, will be brought to Honolulu, and kept as a prisoner at large. The principles of Christianity have been most happily exhibited by Kalaimoku and his chiefs in the prosecution of the war : it has been conducted with as little as possible of the former sanguinary spirit of their conflicts. The rebel party proved small in number and weak in power, all avowedly pagans, with George, a professed sceptic, at their head.*

The whole result of this commotion promises to be propitious instead of adverse to the cause of Christianity. The chiefs have felt their dependence on the mission for

* Although George Tamoree, or Humehuma as he was denominated by the people, headed the rebels, the war did not probably originate with him. A day or two before his death, Kaumualii, his late father, made his will. I was present on the occasion, and heard him distinctly and explicitly state, in the presence of the assembled chiefs, his desire that, at his decease, the ships he possessed, the fort, and arms, and ammunition, together with the islands of Kauai and Nihau, should be given to Kalaimoku for the king Liholiho, then absent in England. When Kalaimoku, with about forty followers, went down to fix the future government of the islands, many of the chiefs brought him presents, thereby paying him homage as their chief. Among others, George was proceeding down the river from this district, with a canoe laden with provision and fruits for Kalaimoku, who by Kaumualii had been appointed his guardian. Kiainakau, who was the most active promoter of the war, with several other warrior chiefs, met him, stopped his canoe, and said, " You shall not pay him homage, neither will we ; come with us — you shall be our king ; the islands are yours, as they were your father's ; you shall be king, and we the nae koa warriors. Much will fight for you." George carried not his present, united with them, formed a party, and took a principal share in the attack and subsequent war. Kiainakau, after committing an act of most barbarous and treacherous murder in the onset, was afterwards slain, and his body treated with great indignity.

Among the friends of Kalaimoku, who were slain the attack on the fort, there was a fine, tall, intelligent young Englishman, whose name was Trowbridge. He had left the ship in which he reached the islands, and commanded one of the vessels belonging to Kalaimoku, by whom he was highly respected. — William Ellis.

right counsel in a time of anxiety and emergency ; have experienced the happy consequences of our instructions in meliorating the horrors of warfare ; and have apparently fixed their confidence and affection upon us with fresh warmth and firmness.

Before leaving Lahaina, Kaahumanu gave orders to the head-men of all the districts of Maui, to have the following laws proclaimed by herald to all the people. First, "There shall be no murder," referring especially to the crime of infanticide. Second, "There shall be no drunkenness, no boxing, no fighting." Third, "There shall be no theft." Fourth, "All the people must regard the Sabbath." Fifth, "When schools are established, all the people must learn."

Her departure, this morning, was among the most interesting scenes we have yet known with the chiefs. A messenger requesting an interview before her embarkation, called us early to her dwelling. At the weekly lecture, yesterday afternoon, she appeared deeply interested, and wept much, during my sermon from the text, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light to my path." At the close of the exercises she was asked why she wept ; to which she replied, "Oh ! it is so true, that the word of God is a lamp and a light. In former days we were all in thick darkness. We wandered here, and we wandered there, and stumbled on this side and on that side, and were all hastening to the dreadful precipice down which our fathers have fallen ! But now, the word of God has come to us, and I now see the darkness and the light. I now see the path that leads to Heaven ! And I weep because God has been so good as to send the light of his word to us poor people !" She seemed to be still in the same softened state of feeling : and in her countenance, manners, dress, and whole deportment, appeared more like a Christian than we had before seen her. Almost immediately after our first salutation, she requested to have worship by a hymn and prayer ; after which she called forward three young men belonging to her private school — informed us she had appointed them teachers for her people on the windward side of Maui ; and desired that they might be supplied with books sufficient for large schools. She then addressed herself to the head-men of that district, who were present, commanding them to have good school-houses erected immediately, and to order all the people in her name to attend to the palapala and the pule. She also commended us, with Pupuhi, Taua the Tahitian, to the protection and care of the governess of Lahaina, who was of the company, charging her to supply all our wants; and finally, turning to us, said, "Great is our affection for you. Whatever we have is yours. Want for nothing that we have. If you are hungry, ask the governess, and she will send you food. Want for nothing: for great is our affection for you."

Her sister Hoapiliwahine then joined with her in calling for another hymn and prayer, at the conclusion of which, parting salutations were exchanged, and they hastened to their boats. We could not avoid remarking the effect of this interview on Puaiki, our blind friend. He seemed ready to kiss her feet, for gratitude and joy at the decided stand this powerful regent was taking in favor of Christianity, and would not let go his grasp of her hand till her barge had pushed off from the beach, and he was mid-deep in water. Taua, too, seemed equally elated, and repeatedly exclaimed to us, "Ikaika loa e Kaahumanu — ikaika loa! — ikaika no! Kaahumanu!" "Very strong (firm, zealous, decided) is Kaahumanu — very strong! decided indeed is Kaahumanu!"

Jan. 1, 1825. My first note at this date, my dear M——, must, in part at least, be retrospective. Since October, I have kept brief notes only of passing occurrences; owing principally to an unexpected visit at Oahu, to the full occupation of my time with other duties while there, and to the accumulation of business during my absence, which required immediate attention on my return. We have also been much engaged, during the last month, in making preparations to go to that island, by the first favorable opportunity, to spend the winter. The duties of the station at Honolulu, since the embarkation of Mr. Ellis for England, including at present the formation of one or two new books, and the superintendence of the press, are such as to make it desirable that Mr. Bingham should have an assistant preacher, at least for a few months; and several circumstances combine to make it most proper that myself and family should be the persons to remove there.

My passage to Oahu was in the whale ship Enterprise, Capt. Weeks, a gentleman among the most esteemed of the friends we have met in the Pacific ; and in whose officers and ship we have taken a lively interest. Nothing of particular importance occurred while I was at Oahu ; and after a visit of three weeks, I returned home in one of the native pilot-boats.

Thus you have a hasty outline of the last six weeks with us : and to the present date, when we all enter on another of the larger divisions of time. Not one word of all that has befallen you and yours, during the whole year just past, has reached us ; though doubtless much has taken place within your own walls and the circle of our immediate family friends, of deeper interest to us than anything we have transmitted or can transmit from the loneliness and almost unchanging sameness of these dreary abodes.

I have just had a more serious debate in my own mind, than at any former time, as to the advantage of continuing to write to you in the form I have thus far done, or not. I have thrown little that can interest into my past journals. All that I have said of the scenery and natural productions of the islands ; of the people ; their general appearance, manners, habits, &c. &c. has been so very incidental and commonplace. I have been led to continue them thus for a time, only from the hope that they might become more worthy your attention in these respects ; but experience teaches me to fear, that my duties as a missionary will compel me to write to you hereafter, even in a more hasty manner than I have yet done ; and necessarily cause all that I say to be of the same desultory and imperfect character as the past.

You must remember, that the situation I am in, and the various and constant calls on my time and attention, place me in very different circumstances from the visiter of a few months, or a year, at the islands, or of the voyager who comes only to explore them. These have nothing to confine them day after day, and month after month, to the narrow limits of a single settlement or village, but are at liberty both in body and mind, to scour the country through valley and over mountain, till they have filled their note-books with observations, and their portfolios with drawings : whereas we are so situated in a variety of respects, as to make an excursion of a day a matter of consultation and considerable previous arrangement. For instance, we do not think it proper that Mr. Richards and myself, should both be absent from the mission houses at the same time, except for an hour or two : the duties of the mission almost daily call one of us away more or less ; and the other, of course, feels it necessary to remain near the premises.

Impediments of this kind are so various and almost constant, that I have never yet had a convenient opportunity of visiting even the mountains that rise within three miles of the seaside, and whose winding glens, dark forests, and towering summits, as seen from our enclosure, promise a rich compensation to the lover of nature, for the toil that would accompany a visit to them. This would not have been the case however, were a walk of an hour or two, or of an afternoon or morning, sufficient for the excursion. A long day, at least, would be necessary to enable one to ascend the nearest, and reach home again before night. In going, there must also be a choice of time, for it very frequently rains on their tops, at all times of the year, and nine times out of ten, they are covered with clouds. A guide would be necessary, and persons to carry water, &c. &c. ; so that you must not condemn me for a want of curiosity and taste, in having lived for eighteen months in full sight of some of the most picturesque and lofty mountains of the Pacific, without visiting them, till you have taken into consideration the preparations necessary for the undertaking ; besides the want of leisure and the difficulty of leaving home, even for a day in continuance. Every deep valley, and every elevated peak, about "the sources of the Susquehanna," can testify to my love of rambling ; and were it equally accessible, the finest scenery of my adopted country should bear witness to my love of "the sublime and beautiful:" but were I again with you, I could cross and recross one half the hills that encircle your lovely lake, in less time and with less fatigue, than I could pass up the nearest ravine, or ascend the lowest of the mountains in our vicinity.

Should we live, Mr. Richards and myself design in the course of a few months to make the tour of Maui; in which case, I may have it in my power to give you a full description of it, with a variety of other matter. It has also been proposed that I should make the tour of Oahu, in company with Mr. Bingham during my anticipated visit this winter, which will also afford subjects for the pen and pencil: in both cases we have a double object in view — observations on the islands, and the preaching of the everlasting gospel to their numerous population.

The blessings of a new year meet us in circumstances of more than ordinary quiet and regularity, and the order of our little cabin is more systematic than it has been since our establishment on the islands.

The sketch of a day at present will give you the regular engagements of a month; and in its peaceful progress, I can assure you, we find no inconsiderable degree of contentment and happiness. We generally rise with the sun, and spend the first hour in religious and devotional reading; breakfast at eight o'clock, a frugal meal, as we are entirely without butter, sugar, and coffee; and immediately after have family worship. The hours from nine to twelve, Mr. Richards and myself devote to the study of the native language, and to the preparation of exercises for some one of the native religious meetings. At ten o'clock in the morning, and at five in the afternoon, Kekauonohi, the youngest queen of Liholiho, and one of her favorite female friends, an interesting and intelligent girl of fifteen, come with their retinue to study, under the direction of H——; while the young princess and another scholar visit Mrs. Richards for the like purpose, at the same hours.

After dinner we devote an hour to miscellaneous reading, of which the periodical publications sent from America, and our united libraries, form a tolerable collection. I then visit the schools, call on the chiefs, and afterwards walk to our garden, about half a mile from the beach, on the plantation given us by Kalaimoku, on our first arrival at Lahaina. This I have succeeded in reducing to a regular form, have enclosed it by rows of bananas, planted the grape, pine-apple, orange and tamarind, besides a variety of vegetables, and some choice shrubs and flowers; and in its cultivation and improvement have great amusement, and much promised future delight. In these walks I am often accompanied by H—— and C——, while B—— is engaged in a fine school kept by her every afternoon, in the chapel adjoining our yard.

As to our evenings, though it is now our winter, they are ushered in with little of that luxury of comfort which the Christian poet must often have felt before he could so sweetly have sung,

Now stir the fire and close the shutters fast,
Let fall the curtains, wheel the sofa round,
And, while the bubbling and loud hissing urn
Throws up a steamy column, and the cups
That cheer but not inebriate, wait on each,
So let us welcome peaceful evening in.

Still evening is the pleasantest portion of the day. Our yard is no longer crowded by noisy natives, whose chiefs are lounging about our writing-desks and work-tables, C—— forgets his mischief and his play, in the sweetness of infantile sleep; all out of doors is silent, except the restless surf; and we are left without interruption, renewedly to apply ourselves to this unformed language, that we may be qualified for more extensive usefulness in the stations we occupy. At nine o'clock, we turn to the bible, which we are studying with Scott and Henry's commentaries, and, after an hour spent in reading, and in passing an examination on the portion which occupied our attention on the preceding night, we again have family worship, and retire to rest usually between ten and eleven o'clock.

Our regular public duties with the natives are, two sermons on the Sabbath; a weekly lecture every Wednesday; a meeting for conversation and prayer every Friday afternoon; and the monthly concert on the first Monday of every month. We have worship in English every Sabbath, but only read a sermon, unless there are ships at the anchorage. Such is the employment of our time in this heathen land, and such the routine of duty which our little cottage in a greater or less degree daily witnesses ; and had we, in addition to our present sources of happiness, only a ready, were it but an occasional, access to the society of those friends, around whom, far as they are from us, our warm affections are daily hovering, I could most sincerely exclaim,

“ O blest seclusion from a jarring world,
Which we, thus occupied, enjoy ! —
Had we the choice of sublunary good,
What could we wish that we possess not here ! ”

Sabbath evening, Jan. 2. Though I wrote so fully yesterday, I will not pass over the present day without at least one word of notice. Like the first Sabbath of the last year, this has been distinguished to us, by the administration of both the sacraments of the Christian church. The exercises of the morning were divided between Mr. Richards and myself, by his preaching the sermon, and my baptizing the infant daughter of Taau, our Tahitian assistant, and afterwards distributing the elements of the Lord's Supper to the little company of disciples, who, in the seclusion and darkness of this island, are from time to time permitted to eat bread and drink wine, in remembrance of their crucified Redeemer. Hundreds of the natives, chiefs and people, were present, and formed a most orderly and attentive audience. The exhibition of the broken body and shed blood of Jesus Christ, was uncommonly solemn and affecting, and drew tears, not only from those who had a part in it, but from the eyes of many who were only spectators of the scene. Several of the chiefs, Puaiki, the blind man, and a young English sailor present, wept almost convulsively.

The exercises of spirit manifested at this service, in our humble chapel — the tenderness, the solemnity, the peaceful enjoyment, evident in those, who in attempting to trust themselves beneath “ the shadow of the wings of the Almighty, drank from the rivers of his pleasure, and were satisfied with the fatness of his house ; ” the seriousness, the attention, the tears of some who only witnessed the affecting ordinance — all combined to make it to our souls a happy beginning of the Sabbaths of another year; a beginning well calculated to strengthen our faith, to excite our hope, and influence our zeal in the discharge of the duties which crowd upon us in this region of darkness and of the shadow of death. I think the present has surpassed every Sabbath we have yet attempted to sanctify with the heathen. Oh, my dear M——, how much do I wish, that the friends and supporters of missions to the pagan world, could be present at such scenes as we are permitted here weekly and almost daily to witness. Many, very many of the hundreds, who crowd to the worship of God to-day, seem, at least by their actions, to say “How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts!” And the decency and order of their behavior, the motionless posture, the fixed eye, and flowing tears, as they hung on the lips of the speaker, as if to catch the words of eternal life, must have touched the sensibility of the man, while they would have melted the heart of the Christian. The love and gratitude too, that they manifest as they press round us at the conclusion of the service, the many anxious inquiries they make, when any one of our number is indisposed, all prove that “the feet of them that publish good tidings on these dark mountains, are indeed beautiful in their eyes.” May the Lord bless his truth to their everlasting salvation.

Thursday, 7. The young queen Kakauonohi, has just sent a little present to H——, which reminds me of saying something on a subject, which has often attracted my observation — the fondness of the natives for ornaments of the head and neck; and how much in their view full dress consists in proper attention to these. The present is a neatly formed triple wreath of orange colored flowers, the blossom of the ilina — gardenia — a handsome shrub from two to four feet high, which, on account of its bright hue and delicate perfume, is cultivated on almost every plantation, expressly for the purpose of wearing on the head and neck. Though so simple in its character, it probably cost the persons who made it, almost, if not quite, as much time and patience as many a more valuable one has an expert milliner, in more polished nations. It is about two yards in length, and is formed, not by arranging the flowers together in the state they are in when broken from the bush, but by carefully separating the calyx and corolla of every blossom, and stringing the latter through the centre, so closely together that nothing is seen, when the wreath is completed, but the edges of the petals, which at a little distance have the softness and richness of feathers or velvet. I have seen the princess with eight or ten yards thus formed, on her head and neck at one time; and though each wreath is half an inch or more in diameter, the effect, as an ornament, was light and graceful.

These wreaths form the most common ornament of the head and neck, and every high chief is furnished with three or four yards of them every morning.

A kind equally common among the chiefs, but more highly valued on account of their stronger perfume, are formed from a part of the fruit or berry of the hala — a species of the palm. These also are of a bright orange color, but much more heavy, and less becoming than the former. On public occasions, the chiefs generally wear feathers only, both for coronets and necklaces. These are generally yellow, but often formed of successive clusters of red, yellow, green and black feathers. An ornament for the neck, formerly much worn by the high chiefs, but now confined almost entirely to those of inferior standing, is the palaoa. It consists of a greater or less quantity of finely braided human hair, fastened together so as barely to encircle the neck, having a hooked or highly polished ornament, made from the tooth of a whale, attached to the middle in front. Some of these contain sixty or eighty yards only of the braid, while others consists of four hundred or more; they are all hereditary badges of rank, and are only worn by those who have some claim to chieftainship. The use of this last is principally confined to females; but all others are worn indiscriminately, by both sexes. Another favorite wreath for the neck, from the king to his pipelighter, is composed of loosely arranged clusters of the maile, an aromatic vine, found in great abundance in the mountains, not unlike the myrtle in the shape of its leaf, &c. but of a more lively color.

The handsomest wreath I have ever seen, not entirely of feathers, was one worn by Kaahumanu, the morning she last left Lahaina, in September. It consisted of yellow feathers, among which the blossoms of the purple globe amaranthus, was ingeniously and tastefully disposed. I have seen a few necklaces of shells, both land and sea. Those made of whale's teeth are very common. The only kind of bracelet that is worn, consists of two shells of various degrees of beauty, fastened on the back of the wrist by a small cord of cotton or silk — formerly of grass or hemp.

The common people are as fond of ornaments of these kinds as the chiefs, and you scarce see the poorest of them of either sex, or of any age, without them. You seldom meet any one at work on his farm, bringing water from the interior of the settlement, or wood from the mountains, without witnessing some exhibition of his ingenuity and taste, in the arrangement of a wreath for his head. There is scarce anything in the vegetable kingdom produced on the islands, that is not made subservient to this purpose, either in root, branch, flower or fruit ; and so great is the variety in the construction and combination of them, that on almost any public occasion, with but little aid of the imagination, one might at a single glance, recognize all the boasted crowns of republican Rome, from the rude civica, and humble obsidionalis, to the more dignified and graceful triumphalis.

Red peppers, tomatos, the blossoms of the sun-flower, various arrangements of common Indian corn, either parched or in the state in which it is shelled from the cob, as well as the rich flowers of the amaranthus, and ohia leihua — a species of eugenia — form a decoration for the head. The American manner of dressing the hair is becoming common among the females of the higher ranks ; but among the lower classes, especially among those advanced in years, the more customary mode is to wear the hair short in front and on the sides of the head, and to turn up the edges on the forehead and temples, with a wash made of white clay or lime.

The manner of wearing anything on the head is universally the same, being immediately on the top, from the upper line of the forehead to the outer edge of the crown, like the circles of light often seen in engravings of saints.

These bandeaus and necklaces, and the bracelets of shells constitute the entire dress above the waist, in which the females generally appear, unless there be the addition in some cases, of a silk or cotton handkerchief, tied round the neck like a sling, and to which are suspended a small circular or oblong looking-glass set in wood, and a copper, brass or silver-mounted tobacco-pipe.

Thus ornamented, with a new pau, of plain crimson or orange, or of a variety of figures and colors, they walk out with as much pride of dress, as a modern belle at home in the full costume of fashion.

Jan. 13. We cannot write even at this season, from these mild latitudes of "nipping frosts" and "drifting snow;" still, even here winter comes "to rule the varied year,

Sullen and sad, with all her rising train
Of vapors, clouds, and storms."

In the summer, scarce a cloud ever floats in the brightness of our glowing skies; but in the winter, especially thus far in the present season, we have much dark and lowering weather, with occasional heavy rains. For several days past, all without doors, has been exceedingly gloomy; and when I first rose this morning, while a green and chilling surf was tumbling and foaming the whole distance between the reef and shore, such impenetrable darkness overspread the whole sea, that a vessel could not have been seen a dozen yards beyond the breakers.

The climate of the islands is far more cool than might be supposed, judging from the latitude in which they are situated. This is partly owing to the vast unbroken body of water by which they are surrounded, but principally and more immediately to the prevalence of the north-east trade wind, which, during the larger portion of the year, sweeps over and about them with great velocity, and, from the direction in which it comes, and the surface over which it passes, possesses no inconsiderable refrigerative power. In the trade-wind, the mercury in Fahrenheit's thermometer—in the shade—seldom rises higher than 80 and 82 deg., during the summer, and 72 and 74 deg., during the winter.

From the very great height of the mountains, however, there are places and districts on the leeward or western sides of some of the islands, which are inaccessible to the regular wind, except when it becomes a gale, breaking over the lower hills, and rushing in strong eddies round the points and promontories, which at ordinary times form a barrier to it. Lahaina is situated on one of these spots, and probably is the hottest district in the group; the mercury usually rising as high in winter here as it does in mid-summer where the trades prevail; and in summer frequently to 88 and 89 deg.

During the summer months, or from March to October, when the trade-wind is most strong and most regular, Lahaina enjoys a pleasant, and often fresh sea-breeze; but even then, there is not circulation enough to give it the ventilation received wherever the former wind reaches. In winter, when the trades are generally light, and often interrupted entirely by calms and south-westerly winds, the sea-breeze also becomes light and variable, and a much greater stagnation of air takes place, rendered doubly impure by exhalations from the kalo beds and fish-ponds, which are numerous throughout the settlement. These circumstances cause the climate of Lahaina to be rather unfavorable to health.

As to clouds and rain, from March to October the atmosphere throughout all the islands is usually clear and bright, similar to the finest weather in June in the United States. On the windward or eastern parts, however, there are almost daily showers, and in the mountains not unfrequently continued rains, from the lodgment of clouds against their tops and sides. In most places on the leeward sides there are also occasional showers; but at Lahaina scarcely a cloud, except on the mountains, is during the summer to be seen, and a drop of rain, during those months, seldom falls. From September to April, the atmosphere is more or less hazy, obscure and cloudy, with frequent light rains in some places, and, in others, heavy storms of two or three days' continuance. We have had three storms only, at Lahaina, since our residence here, and they have been in December, January, and March.

Becket, arrived from Honolulu, and at twelve o'clock, our friends Dr. and Mrs. Blatchely, and Mr. Hoffman, mineralogist on board the Russian discovery ship, Capt. Kotzebue, now at Oahu, landed at the mission house. Mr. Hoffman is an interesting young man, apparently not more than twenty-two or twenty-four years old, of highly prepossessing appearance and agreeable manners. He makes his home with us while the brig remains; and we feel ourselves happy in entertaining a guest of so much intelligence and good breeding.

Wednesday, 19. At noon yesterday, we discovered the pilot-boat Astor, bounding before a fresh breeze, over the waters of the Molokai channel, and, in the course of an hour, welcomed Mr. Chamberlain to Lahaina. He is on his way to Hilo, on the east of Hawaii, with supplies for Waiakea, and will spend a few days with us while the vessel is taking in a cargo of salt.

Mr. Chamberlain, in his station of agent of the mission, with the superintendence of secular concerns, is a most invaluable and indefatigable fellow-laborer with us. In entering the situation he now occupies, he relinquished a partnership in a mercantile establishment of Boston, successfully engaged in business, with the most flattering prospects of affluence, placed his capital in the stocks, devoting the interest to the missionary cause, and, in contrast to his former situation, may now almost daily be seen at Honolulu, with a cheerful face and happy heart, driving a team of oxen, or drawing a porter's barrow, from the mission house to the village; or in a coarse carman's frock, toiling among the barrels and boxes of his store-house.

For the last two days, Mr. Hoffman, attended by Mr. Richards, has been scouring the country in search of specimens in mineralogy; and this afternoon I accompanied him in a walk to the foot of one of the mountains immediately to the east of our settlement, for the same object, but without meeting anything new or particularly interesting. The mineralogical kingdom here presents little variety in its exhibitions; everything is almost exclusively volcanic, and in forms long familiar to the scientific world. The arrangement and combination of these forms, however, are frequently such as to create admiration and astonishment; especially on Hawaii, which in this respect, taken as a whole, including the sublime and fearful exhibitions of the great crater of Kilauea, is among the greatest phenomena of the Pacific.

The Becket sails for Kailua to-morrow, and carries from us all our visitors, excepting Mr. Chamberlain. While at my writing-desk this evening, Mr. Hoffman left on a sheet of paper the name of his ship, and a list of her officers, as a little memento of his visit.

This gave rise to some remarks on the character of Capt. Kotzebue ; among other things Mr. Hoffman stated, that he was a great admirer of Washington. During the morning, in looking over some papers preparatory to my visit to Honolulu, I had found in the folds of one of my pocket-books, a sprig of evergreen plucked from a tree on the humble tomb of our illustrious countryman, when I visited Mount Vernon, in 1821. I immediately handed it to Mr. Hoffman, saying, "If Capt. Kotzebue admires Washington, even this trifle will be thought acceptable by him;" but the moment he knew its origin, with enthusiastic earnestness, though not without evident embarrassment at the liberty taken of directing it from the person mentioned, he exclaimed, "Non, non, Monsieur, non Kotzebue, moi-même, moi-même ;" "No, no, sir, not Kotzebue, not Kotzebue ; myself ! myself !" — to which I most readily assented ; and added as a testimony of my personal regard, what I had before designed for that purpose, a neat pocket edition of the testament in French, the language in which we had attempted to hold most of our conversations.

Saturday, 29. The Becket came to anchor yesterday afternoon, from Hawaii, and we are again favored with the society of the interesting young naturalist from the Pretpratie. Tuesday next is the day fixed for sailing for Oahu.

Monday, 31. For a year past, except in one or two instances, we have scarce heard the sounds of the native songs and dances. But an expected heir, in a high branch of the Pitt family, has filled the minds of some of the chiefs and people, not particularly interested in the palapa and the pule — learning and religion — with a desire for the renewal of former expressions of joy on such occasions: among which songs and dances, in honor of the young chief at his birth, were some of the most favorite. These persons have for some time had pieces in preparation for the event. The rehearsal of such as, technically speaking, are thus "getting up," disturb the peacefulness and quietude of our nights; and the groves around us, especially since an unclouded moon has been on the increase, are filled till daybreak, with the dull and monotonous drumming of the calabash and musical sticks, accompanied by the more piercing and equally rude and inharmonious intonations of the voice.

Our governess, Wahine Pio, sister of Mr. Pitt — Kalaimoku — is the grandmother of the expected chief. She has never been distinguished for her attachment to the new system of things, and is supposed to have ordered the practicings of the hula. The common people, desirous of having the dances, have sedulously encouraged a report in circulation, that Kalaimoku, still at Kauai, has sent orders to the windward islands, to have all attention to the pala-pala and pule, except the observance of the Sabbath, suspended for the present, and to have all the people engage in the dances, as was formerly the case, when thousands joined at one time in the same performance. These circumstances have given rise to one or two anecdotes, which have just reached me, shewing the light in which the pala-pala party view the subject.

Kekaunohi, the youngest queen of Liholiho, a pupil of H——, is the daughter of Wahine Pio. She has been indisposed for a few days, and her mother has lodged at her house for a night or two. Before sunrise this morning, our warm friend Puaiki, who is ever awake to everything that interests the cause of learning and piety, came to our houses, and said to Mr. Richards — "I heard a voice in the night, when all were asleep, in the house of Kekaunohi; it was" (proceeding to repeat a dialogue between the daughter and mother) "thus" — K. "Ha! — Wahine Pio — Wahine Pio!" to which W. P. replied, "what is it?" K. "I am the daughter, and you are the mother — I am a child, and you are an old chief — it is yours to command — it is mine to obey — it is yours to speak — it is mine to listen : but I am wise and you are dark hearted — you do not fear God nor regard his word, therefore hear me — have no hula in Lahaina — the hula is not good." W. P. "I have not commanded a hula!" K. "Then forbid it." W. P. Kalaimoku may desire it, and may send orders to have a general hula." K. "Kalaimoku will not desire one: if he does, do you not comply: I will make your peace with Kalaimoku." W. P. "It shall be so, I will not have a hula, I will attend to the word of God."

Kalaikoa, who has prepared a communication for Kalaimoku, to go by the Becket, thus introduces his letter — "Love to you Kalaimoku. We have heard a report at Lahaina; we have heard that you have had a dance. I have a question to ask you — is it true? If it is, I will say, that I am not glad. Will you send to us to have a dance? If you do, we will not regard your order; for the song and the dance are not good — they belong to the darkness of former days. We sung and danced enough then, in the ignorance of our hearts; the light has now come — let us do so no more, but let us attend only to the good word of God."

We are satisfied that the report in reference to Kalaimoku is false, and that he has not commanded, or even countenanced, the spirit of dissipation existing in some.

CHAPTER XIII.

VISIT AT HONOLULU.

Mission house, Honolulu, Feb. 4, 1825. We are again, my dear M——, visitors at this station. We embarked on board the Becket, on the evening of the 1st instant, and arrived here the next morning to a late breakfast. Although the night was very cool for this climate, the thermometer standing at 64 deg. Fahrenheit, we all kept the deck, in preference to enduring the confined air of the cabin.

H—— was extremely ill, as were C—— and B——. Could you have seen them lying on the open deck of a dirty native brig, and witnessed their extreme illness, with no attendant but myself during the whole night, you would have thought with us, that the passages we are obliged to make in such vessels, are among the greatest trials of our residence at the islands.

We are delightfully situated — for missionaries I mean — with our invaluable friends Mr. and Mrs. Bingham, in the stone cottage built by Mr. Ellis. Oahu never before looked so beautiful; for the first time since we arrived at the islands, the whole of the extensive plain, on which Honolulu and the mission houses are, is covered with verdure, and appears like one continued field of grain, in the early months of spring; the grass being coarse, and of a light green color. The greater purity of the air than that of Lahaina is also very perceptible, and makes us feel that Oahu, so far as we are capable of judging, is the Montpelier of the Sandwich islands: owing to the prevalence of the trade-winds, which sweep over the mountains — not here, as on most of the other islands, so high as to form a barrier against them. Every part of the island is thus constantly ventilated, and preserved from any degree of the stagnation to which Lahaina is subject.

Our young friend Hoffman, a fellow passenger from Maui, was met on the wharf with warm embraces by his friends of the Pretpriatie. The handsome dresses and gentlemanly appearance of these voyagers of the enterprising Czar, give an additional aspect of civilization to Honolulu. Mr. Hoffman, with some of his friends, visits us every day. He takes tea with us this evening; after which we are to go to an observatory erected for astronomical purposes on shore, with the special design of viewing the planet Saturn through a fine telescope.

Monday, 7. On Saturday, Mr. Bingham and myself took tea, and passed the evening on board the Pretpriatie. She is a well-built, substantial, and fine ship, of twenty-two guns, constructed under the direction of Capt. Cotzebue, expressly for the voyage she is now performing. Her deck is remarkably handsome, and the accommodations of the officers and crew very convenient. Captain's cabin is large, airy, and well, but not handsomely, furnished — no carpets nor drapery. The chairs, sofa, tables, and side-board, of plain mahogany, with one or two large mirrors. The most ornamental article is a richly painted half-length portrait of Alexander of Russia ; to which may be added a smaller engraved likeness of the same imperial personage, exquisitely finished, and said to be much more correct than the former. It is the production of a French artist, executed at the time the emperor was in Paris.

The officers' cabin is separated from the captain's by the companion-way, and is fitted so as to afford, besides a comfortable dining and sitting room, a large state room for each of the lieutenants, midshipmen, and naturalists. Immediately forward of this, is the fore-castle, where the crew, one hundred in number, are neatly and conveniently accommodated. One end of this apartment is used as a chapel, and furnished with an altar, a shrine of the Virgin Mary, a tolerably executed Madonna, one or two crosses, and a painting of our Saviour, surrounded by portraits of the apostles, in twelve compartments of the same frame.

Every Saturday evening there is a public service, and we were gratified by an opportunity of witnessing the ceremonies of the Greek church. On this occasion, they consisted of the services of the rubric in Slavonic, prayers, lessons, chants, the offering of incense by the priest, who officiated in an embroidered mantle of green, crimson and gold ; the kissing of the bible and of a cross, at the close of the service, held by the priest, to each individual, after the benediction. There was no exhortation, nor anything in the form of preaching. During the ceremonies, which occupied more than an hour, the crew stood six abreast, three on the starboard and three on the larboard side, in regular lines from the altar to the bows, observed the greatest order, and seemed to listen with suitable solemnity to the worship. The officers, among whom we took our places, formed a group immediately behind the chaplain, and, by their apparent reverence and devotion, set a commendable example to the crew. Their full, deep-toned voices, and, in some instances, good taste in singing, added much to the effect of the chants and anthems, the choruses of which, in two or three instances, were very fine.

Though, in the whole, there was a striking want of that simplicity which we believe characterized the primitive church of Christ, still we could but regard with tender interest and complacency, a scene in which so large, so youthful, and so noble a company, publicly and solemnly testified their remembrance and fear of God, rather than uniting in the shameless exhibitions of wickedness, which too often, by day and by night, scandalize the Christian name of ships at anchor at these islands.

Within the last two days, there have been arrivals both from the leeward and windward stations, and the very animating letters received by them from the missionaries and chiefs, promise a more interesting state of things in the mission, than we have yet known.

Wednesday, 9. Yesterday morning, Mr. Hoffman and myself, after an early cup of coffee, visited the salt lake, of which I have already given you a description. The morning was so fine, the air so pure and bracing, that without any exertion or fatigue, we returned in time to dine with the family at one o'clock. Before reaching the village, we descried a sail, coming from Kauai. It proved to be the native brig Ainoa, which came to anchor just after dark. Shortly after, a messenger from the royal family arrived, requesting a visit from us to Kaahumanu, who had been absent some months to the leeward, and had just landed.

Our interview with her and the heads of the nation, was uncommonly pleasant and interesting. We found them in one of the upper rooms of her new house, on the point. The room was well lighted by several handsome glass lamps, and was furnished with a neat Chinese sofa, under a large and richly framed looking-glass, two mahogany card-tables covered with expensive cloths of orange and blue, and three large field bedsteads hung with drapery of beautifully figured yellow merino cloth. On the floor, in the middle of the room, which was spread with new mats, of the finest and handsomest kind, the group was seated; consisting of Kaahumanu, in the centre, Kalaimoku on one side, the queens of Liholiho on the other — while the sisters of Kaahumanu, Kealiiahonui, her husband (a son of Kaumualii) Laanui, Tahitona, a Tahitian, (private tutor and chaplain of Kaahumanu and Kealiiahonui) and two or three confidential attendants, made up the circle. They were all well dressed, and apparently most happy in the arrival of the regent and queen.

The first salutation we received from Kaahumanu, was in these words — “We are saved by Jesus Christ,” or “Jesus Christ is our salvation ;” and the whole conversation of the evening was on the subject of religion alone, which seemed to be the only topic of their thoughts and desires. When I recollected what they once were, noisy, drunken, debauched, disgusting idolators, and observed the sobriety of their appearance, the mildness of their manners, the piety of their conversation, and the tenderness and affection of their looks and expressions to us, while my heart deeply felt the power of the contrast, and most sincerely blessed God for what our eyes saw and our ears heard, I was most forcibly reminded of a little circumstance which gave rise to a happy train of thought and feeling during our first voyage to Lahaina.

Shortly after our arrival at the islands, as you know, we were almost immediately separated from the rest of the mission family, and sent alone to *Mau*i. Not yet familiarized to the noise, the rudeness, and the nakedness of the natives, and in a degree ignorant of the general mildness and harmlessness of their character, for the first few hours, at least, on finding ourselves surrounded by two hundred of them, we naturally felt, in some respects, exposed to trials and dangers ; we knew that the “tender mercies” of the heathen are “cruel,” and felt ourselves completely in their power. While indulging in reflections of this character, I accidentally raised my eyes to the main-top of the barge, and very much to my surprise, in the device on the top cloth, found a subject of meditation, that totally changed the character of my feelings, and so effectually lulled every apprehension to rest, that I have never known one of the kind since. It was a sketch from Isa. xi. 6. “The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid ; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together ; and a little child shall lead them."

After a half hour's general conversation, they requested to have a hymn and prayers ; at the close of which we returned home, greatly pleased with our interview, and with the happy prospects which the engagedness of the chiefs presents for the nation at large.

After breakfast this morning, the whole company, including the young prince, who had not come on shore last night, came to the chapel to return public thanks for their safe return to Oahu, and happy meeting with their friends.

Saturday, 12. We were last evening called to part with our Russian friends of the Pret-priatie, which left the harbor early this morning, and now looks only like a lofty spire in the midst of the ocean, as she is gently securing an offing from the island before night. We have formed a pleasant acquaintance with several of her officers, though only one, besides Capt. Kotzebue, speaks much English. But none has taken such hold on our hearts as the interesting and accomplished young Hoffman ; he has been so constantly in our family, has so greatly commended himself to our love by his intelligence and good breeding, by the warmth and polish of his manners, by the tenderness of his heart, and by a thousand evidences of a virtuous and amiable spirit, that our parting embraces were more like those of long beloved and bosom friends, than of strangers whose acquaintance has been only of a day. In company with his friend and fellow officer count Hayden, he took tea at the mission house, and spent his last hours on shore with us. We feel sad at every remembrance of him, and our prayers hover round the ship that bears him from us, as we see her fading from our sight forever.

Feb 24. Kaahumanu does not enjoy very good health, and by the advice of Dr. Law, her private physician, has retired three or four miles up one of the valleys, east of Honolulu, for the benefit of the mountain air. Those unacquainted with the attention and respect required by the chiefs from their inferiors of all ranks, would scarce believe the bustle which this movement of her majesty has created. The removal of the court of Great Britain from St. James's to Windsor Castle or to Brighton, would not produce half the change in the "West End" at London, that is perceptible among the fashionables of our metropolis.

The road leading to the retreat of the queen, has been almost constantly marked by the equipages — two or three single horse wagons — of the nobility, and by crowds of more humble gentry on foot, with hundreds of attendants and servants, bearing furniture and provisions and a variety of luggage.

Kalaimoku and his family, which since the absence of Liholiho, has included the young queens Kekauluohi, Pauahi, Kinau, and — at present — Kekauonohi, are the only grandees that remain at Honolulu. The etiquette of the court seems to demand their presence, at least occasionally; and though Kaahumanu only left on the morning of the 22d, they have just returned this evening from spending the day with her.

We were quite amused with their appearance, as they approached the mission house. Kalaimoku lead the cavalcade, in a neat yellow wagon, drawn by a fine, and well harnessed horse. His wife, the queens, and his trusty and confidential friends, were on horseback; while their respective retinues, making a large crowd, ran after them on foot, bearing the badges of their distinction, with spittoons and tobacco-boxes, the inseparable appendages of their persons.

The queens were objects of special notice as exhibiting something entirely novel. The horses they rode were gay and spirited, and being unaccustomed to riding, and accommodated with men's saddles only, they rode astride, a la Peru, instead of being seated as females usually are in America and in England. Being very modestly dressed however, there was nothing particularly objectionable in their attitude; especially as it seemed requisite to the safety of their royal persons. They wore handsome slips of a variety of colors, made close in the neck, and with deep paus, or native female dresses over them. As usual, when coming from the country, their heads, necks, and indeed almost the whole of their figures, were covered with garlands of flowers and wreaths of evergreens — which had a pretty effect, especially those that were gracefully entwined in their black hair, hanging, from the exercise they were taking, in loose and careless locks on their necks and shoulders. They sat and rode well, and as far as we could see them, came on a full canter.

March 10. The ships Peru and Almira came into port this morning. They are directly from America, and have brought letters and papers from some of our friends, and considerable supplies for the mission. But every other feeling is lost in the melancholy intelligence of the death of our friends Kamehamalu and Liholiho. The truth is a shock to us ; so much so, that we frankly confess, our tears are mingled with those of the chiefs and people, who are almost overwhelmed by the bereavement. We feel that we have lost those in whom we had a very deep interest, if they did not possess our warm and tender love ; and there were circumstances in their embarkation, the recollection of which will always cause us to sigh, that they were denied, against their own strong wish and against the wish of the mission and of the nation, the privilege of having a pious teacher, interpreter, and guardian with them.

We think it probable our friends in America will feel some solicitude, lest the death of the king should prove an occasion of insurrection and bloodshed in the islands ; but of this we have scarce had a thought, much less an apprehension. So long as the prince Keauikeaouli lives, the right of succession is indisputable. Liholiho, in his council with the chiefs, previous to his embarkation, formally and publicly appointed him successor, in case he should never return ; and from the time of his departure, the lad has been regarded, and officially addressed by the chiefs and people, as their king. This has been more especially the case of late ; so that the intelligence has produced little or no change in his standing in the government, and none in his title, except the assumption of the name of Kamehameha III., as the official signature of the successor of Liholiho.

In every respect, a kind Providence seems to have been preparing the way most happily for the arrival of the tidings ; and the chiefs in power were never before in a state so favorable to political integrity and peace. Auspicious as the whole history of this mission has been ever since its establishment, still the last three months must be regarded as the commencement of a new and more happy era in its progress, than had previously been known.

We have every reason to believe that the principles of eternal truth, with the sanctions from which they are inseparable, which for near five years have been enforced on the minds and the hearts of the leaders of this people, are beginning to have their destined and desired effect on their characters and lives; and that many of the most powerful of them, from the fear of God and a sincere love of his righteousness, are ceasing in heart to do evil, and learning to do well.

The young king, and every chief of any importance, have regular family worship with their respective households morning and evening, never take a meal without thanksgiving, observe the Sabbath with becoming propriety, attend all the religious instructions, and studiously avoid every kind of amusement and pastime not consistent with strict sobriety and Christian decorum. Their whole minds and their whole time seem given to improvement; and so far from becoming weary, they appear more and more desirous of making night and day profitable, by the acquisition of new light and a new knowledge of the word of God. Such is the state in which the melancholy tidings found them, and the effect is apparently such as might be expected; it was a dreadful blow, but we have seen and heard none of the extravagant expressions of heathen grief. For the first day or two, their sorrow was evidently keen and deep, but it was quiet, humble, and Christian; their tears fell silently and rapidly, but they manifested no disposition to indulge in the loud wailing by which they were once accustomed to vent their feelings.

Sabbath evening, April 3. This afternoon, Mr. Chamberlain and myself, accompanied by Richard Kalaïoula — one of the lads educated at Cornwall — walked to a valley about four miles west of Honolulu, to hold a religious service with its inhabitants. A messenger from Kalai-moku had preceded us, giving information of our design, and in obedience to his order, an audience of seventy or eighty were assembled at the house of the headman or overseer of the settlement, to whom I preached from the words, "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." The attention to the exercises was very orderly and respectful, and we made an appointment to meet them again on the ensuing Sabbath.

Mr. Loomis for some months past has gone on horseback, every Sabbath, to two or three villages, several miles distant in the opposite direction. Kealuahonui and Kaiu, the husbands of the queens dowager, Kaahumanu and Kapuli, attend a meeting at two places, at Waikiki, and Mr. Bingham preaches twice in the chapel here — so that beside the English service, which devolves regularly on me, public worship has been held seven times to-day, in six different places, along an extent of coast little short of fifteen miles. It is probable that hereafter, this will, in a greater or less degree, be the systematic distribution of the labors of this station on the Sabbath. And thus a good portion of the leeward side of Oahu will be blest with the proclamations of that word by which alone "the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped." By these "Sabbath day's journeys," an inroad will be made, as we hope, in the pollutions of the land, and an "highway" formed, which shall be called "the way of holiness," where "the unclean shall not pass over," but where the redeemed shall walk, and the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs of everlasting joy upon their heads.

Friday, 8. I was roused this morning by the exclamation, "the Royal George is lost!" and on reaching the window, regretted exceedingly to see the fine English ship — formerly a sloop of war — of that name, high on the reef a mile or two west of the mouth of the harbor, a complete wreck, without a mast standing. It appears she was run ashore through the carelessness of the first officer, while the captain was on board another vessel. The night was not very dark, and the wind fresh off the land; so that the person having charge of the ship, seems to be enexcus-able. The vessel, with everything she contains, will be entirely lost. Stripped of her loftiness and her pride, and high among the breakers, she looks lonely and desolate indeed. The sight has deeply impressed my mind with the meaning and the force of the figure of the apostle, taken from such a scene — the shipwreck of faith. If the destruction of a noble but perishable piece of human workmanship can thus fill the mind with gloom, ah! what will be the thoughts of those who at last find themselves making an irrevocable shipwreck of the soul, amid the billows of eternity!

Wednesday, 13. One of the native schooners arrived yesterday, bringing letters for the mission and the chiefs, from Lahaina. Among others, were two from our little friend, the princess Nahienaena, which I have seen, and a translation of which I will give you, as a specimen of her composition. They are entirely her own, were fairly and handsomely written on gilt-edged letter-paper, correctly folded, and sealed with wax. You will recollect she is but nine years old.

"Lahaina, Maui, Aperila 7th, 1825.

Very great love to you, O Paalua, sick at the place where you dwell. We have heard of the death of your foster son, our king. We know it from the letter of Boki, brought by an English ship, now here. Also the death of your sister, Kamehamalu, our queen. Your sovereigns are dead — both of them: Liholiho with Kamehamalu. Great is my sorrow, for great was my love for them!

Great also is my love for you. You are sick; think of God. From God only is health; from Him also cometh every blessing, both for the body and for the soul.

Love to you from

NAHIENAENA."

The second letter begins with a salutation to Kaahumanu and Kalaimoku; but after the first paragraph, is addressed exclusively to her brother, now the king.

"Lahaina, Maui, Aperila 7th, 1825.

Love to you two, Kaahumanu with Paalua, — Great sympathy for you, both in your sickness and your grief. My wish is, that you two should be the parents of us;* it is not good for us to be without parents.

And where art thou, my brother? The lord† of us will never return—he is dead! But the word of our true Lord remains, and let us regard it. Listen thou to the word of our eternal Lord.

I pray to God: let us both pray, that Jehovah may cause us to be good through Jesus Christ, the Deliverer from sin, the eternal Lord. Be not deaf to me: it would be an evil thing; but listen to my advice.

Love to you, O Kauikeauli, my brother! Dead is our king at Lonadona;‡ dead also is the sister of us, Kamehamalu! NAHIENAENA."

They do credit to her mind and heart, and we rejoice to see them breathe so much the spirit of her lamented mother, Keopuolani; she is a lovely and promising child, and her brother is scarce less so.

Sabbath evening, April 17. Nearly two years have elapsed since we landed on these distant shores. In all my communications since, in recounting the dispensations of Providence to me and mine, I have been called to mention only "blessings undisguised." We have endured many petty privations, felt some anxieties, known some sorrows and shed some tears; but they were all such as to be classed among the "lighter afflictions" — too trifling to be mentioned in connection with the general prosperity and over balancing happiness we have enjoyed. During the last few days, however, the hitherto unclouded sky has gathered blackness, until this morning our fears were made exquisitely awake to apprehensions of an overwhelming calamity. But the darkness of the day has in much mercy been scattered, and the rainbow of promise and of peace is depicted on the blackness of the averted storm. You, my dear M——, will not think the figure I have thus inadvertently introduced, too strong, when I tell you that H—— has been restored to her husband and her children, after having seemingly trod on the borders of the grave.

She has been ill ever since the birth of a daughter on the 7th of March; and this morning was thought to be dying. The family were assembled, and prayer made to God for the light of his countenance, as she should pass through the dark valley. But, in the course of an hour, a happy alteration in her state took place: every symptom became decidedly favorable, and she is now, for the first time in forty-eight hours, sleeping, with a prospect of refreshment.

Tuesday, 19. Since the Sabbath our alarm for the safety of our dear H——, has, at two or three times, been even greater than it then was; but we are again encouraged by hope. It will give you happiness to know that, when we were most fearful as to the event, we had the high consolation of seeing imparted to her, by her covenant God, not only a spirit of resignation and peace, but thoughts of brightness and of joy, from a good hope through grace, of entering on "the rest that remaineth to his people." The atonement and intercession of Jesus Christ afforded her subjects of comforting and delightful meditation; and in trusting the safety of her soul on them, she could say, that she found the Son of Man to be indeed unto her spirit "as a hiding place from the wind and a covert from the tempest."

April 30. This month closes upon us, as a family, with a darker light than any we have yet known on missionary ground. Serious illness is at any time, and in any circumstances, an affliction; but far from the comforts and resources of civilization and Christianity, far from the sympathy and services of kindred and friends, far from all "the sweet charities of life," it is doubly so. I have at times given you some of the brighter of our domestic scenes; now, had I a skillful pencil, I could give you one of darkness—a sketch in which you would see a young and beloved wife and mother languishing on a bed of unchecked disease; an only son necessarily banished from his home, and made an incumbrance on the family of another; an helpless infant daughter, cast for nourishment and life on the breast of a capricious pagan; and a husband and father, with an humble friend, worn out by the unceasing attentions of the day, and the unrelieved watchings of the night. Such is, such has been, and such we have too much reason to fear still will be, the state of our little household.

But, though the outlines of the picture are dark, in the kind providence of God, with them may be blended touches of light not found in the cases of many fellow missionaries, in similar circumstances, in various parts of the world. We are in a comfortable habitation, and in one of the most salubrious of climates: and though destitute of many articles which at home would be deemed necessary to comfort, by a recent supply of medicines have at hand every desirable prescription, and, through the kindness of some of our visitors, are furnished with many things which are luxuries both in sickness and in health; and thus, in the midst of chastisement, we are enabled to speak of the unceasing goodness and mercy of the Lord.

CHAPTER XIV.

VISIT TO HAWAII.

May 1. The brig Active, from London, arrived some days since, bringing Mr. Charlton, lady and sister, as future residents of Oahu; Mr. Charlton having been appointed, by the British government, consul general for the islands in the Pacific. They left the Blonde frigate, Lord Byron, at Valparaiso. She was to sail in a few days after the Active, and is hourly expected with the survivors of the party — again diminished by the death of Naihe Kukui, or Capt. Jack. He died suddenly at Valparaiso, from an inflammation of the brain.

Monday, 2. The Spirit of the Most High, my dear M——, is not only breathing, as we hope, on the spiritual chaos of this dark and unformed land, but is also, we now and then have reason to believe, moving on the face of the waters, by which we are surrounded, agitating and new-creating the hearts of some of the many who traverse their surface, by the irresistible mandate, "Let there be light." Every season for the return of the whale ships to the islands, brings to our knowledge the cases of some, at least, who, amidst the general and unexampled dissoluteness of their companions, are groaning under the galling chains of sin and guilt, and sighing for the liberty and blessedness of the gospel, or who are rejoicing in the hope of having already been brought, through grace, into all the freedom of the sons of God. Within the last week, besides having two or three personal interviews, I have received two letters from an interesting young man, an officer on board a ship now in the offing, in the former situation. He came to the islands a month since, a perfectly careless and thoughtless sinner; but it can now be said of him, "Behold, he prayeth;" and he is about commencing his voyage to the coast of Japan, with a bosom filled with thoughts and emotions never known before. In one of his letters, he says he has found it a fearful thing for a guilty, convicted, and altogether prayerless soul, to venture into the presence of a just and holy, and justly offended God: a feeling experienced perhaps by all, in greater or less degree, who have attempted to pray, after being suddenly arrested in their sins by the convictions of the Holy Spirit. May he so improve, and so appreciate the inestimable privilege, that his language, with that of the thousands of Israel, shall speedily be —

"Sweet the moments, rich in blessing, Which before the cross I spend!"

Tuesday, 3. In confirmation of the truth of the statement above, I will mention an incident which has just taken place. While at dinner, to-day, a common sailor called, as he said, for "a word of counsel for the good of his soul." The ship to which he belonged did not intend anchoring, but he obtained permission to visit us for a moment, while the captain was transacting a little business on shore. They had been on their voyage nearly two years, and it was now fourteen months since, to use his own expression, "he left off the life of a vagabond, and began to work out his salvation." He had one friend likeminded on board, and thanked God that he could find "teachers of righteousness" in this dark corner of the world.

Friday, 6. Yesterday a pilot-boat came express from Māui with intelligence that the Blonde frigate had just anchored at Lahaina.* This morning at sunrise she was

At 5 o'clock, the vessel was becalmed about six miles from shore. I soon perceived that a boat was lowered, and filled with men. The people being still quiet, and suspecting nothing, I walked along the beach to ascertain who was on board the boat; but had not reached the landing, when I heard a cry from a canoe that approached the shore, "It is Boki, it is Boki." Hoapili beckoned me to follow him. As I walked along, the princess caught my arm, saying, "Stay by me." Hoapili took his seat in a chair upon the beach. I stood at his left hand, with the princess leaning on my side. Thousands collected around, some of whom began to wail. As the company approached, a passage was opened for them into the centre of the circle. The wailing increased, though it was not considerable until the company arrived within about four yards, when Hoapili rose from his chair, threw back his head, and with a roar which scarcely resembled the human voice, he spread out his arms to receive his daughter Kuini, (Boki's wife.) In an instant, all the chiefs present, except the one which leaned on my side, and all the thousands around, set up a screaming, which drowned the roaring of the ocean, and thus summoned to the scene of grief those who till now had not heard the alarm. The princess, in utter neglect of all their ancient forms, sprang forward, and, with a delicacy that would not have disgraced a Charlotte, threw herself into the arms of Kuini; and the latter dropped into the sand, while the tears of the little girl were falling on her breast. At this instant, Hoapili fell on the ground, literally plunged his whole face in the dirt at Boki's feet, and thus gave the signal to all the old veterans of barbarism, who instantly followed his example, and for several minutes scoured their sable faces in the sand. Boki and his company were far more calm than the rest, and could scarcely be said to wail.

After a few minutes, I said to Nahienaena, it would be well to thank Jehovah for this meeting. She immediately spoke to Boki and Kuini. They appeared pleased, and immediately reached me their hands. Boki said, "Where shall we pray?" This was the first word that was spoken by any of the company. Hoping that it might stop the confusion and noise which now prevailed, I proposed to remove to a neighboring yard. They approved, and as we began to move, the wailing in a good measure ceased. Several minutes elapsed before the mats were spread, during which time messages were despatched to the Blonde, which was now furling to be seen off Diamond Hill, and between nine and ten o'clock rounded to, immediately opposite the mission house. On dropping her anchor she fired a salute, which was answered by each of the forts; that on the point within the harbor, and that above us on Punch Bowl Hill. Shortly after, Mr. Bingham, Mr. Loomis, Mr. Chamberlain, and myself, accompanied the chiefs to the point near the fort, to receive Boki and party on their landing from the Blonde.

I scarce ever witnessed a more touching scene. The chiefs, all well dressed in full black, arranged themselves in front of Kaahumanu's frame house, within a few yards of the water's edge. As the well-manned barges of the Blonde approached the low quay, Kaahumanu, her two sisters, and the young queens of Liholiho, slowly advanced her sails. After prayer, I conversed awhile with Boki and Kuini. She spoke in the strongest terms of the good things they had seen, and the kindness with which they had been treated. They express great love to lord Byron, and say he has been exceedingly kind to them.

We were awakened at an early hour this morning, by the reveillé on board the frigate, which was anchored directly in front of our house, and nearer the shore than I have ever seen any other vessel. When I reflected on the benevolent errand, on which she had come, it was a pleasant sight; and I listened with satisfaction to her band of music, which I could distinctly hear, and which lost none of its charms by being removed a little distance on the water. It was a pleasant morning. All was still and quiet on shore, and the countenances of all beamed with joy.

It would occupy quite too much room to tell all that Boki has already said of the people, respecting his interesting voyage. At 9 o'clock, I called on him, found him and his wife, Hoapili and Nahienaena, in a house by themselves, prepared to wait on lord Byron whenever he should arrive. A messenger soon reported his boat to be on its way. Boki went out, and conducted him to the house, in company with several of his officers. The easy and unaffected familiarity of lord Byron, and the interest he manifested in the welfare of our mission, were gratifying beyond expression. I accepted his polite invitation to dine on board the Blonde, and spent several hours in answering his lordship's numerous inquiries respecting our mission, the former state of the islands, and their recent improvements. I have rarely spent a few hours more pleasantly in the society of any man. At 5 o'clock, the frigate weighed her anchor, and, with a pleasant breeze, loftily retired from our shores, and soon was only a speck in the distant horizon.

from the body of the chiefs, towards the place of landing. All was silent, except an occasional burst of grief from some one of the multitude, who were kept at a distance, and prevented thronging the beach by a file of armed men. But, when governor Boki's barge came near enough for the parties to recognize each other, the queens "lifted up their voices" and wept aloud with that melancholy tone of sorrow which we have all heard, at least in some few instances, from a heart deeply touched with grief. A small house immediately on the wharf intercepted the view of the barge at the moment of landing, perhaps to the more powerful effect of the attitude and expression of Boki and his wife, as they burst on the sight from behind it, wringing their hands in agony, and exhibiting the strongest marks of an overwhelming emotion of mingled grief and joy. The parties stood thus for some minutes, without approaching each other, while the whole air was filled with lamentation, and the ground shaken with the thunderings of the minute-guns, which reminded the nation of the fate of their king and queen. They then rushed into each other's embrace, passing from the arms of one to another in a continued paroxysm of weeping, for an hour, while some of the more humble friends of those who had returned, embraced and kissed their feet, and bathed them with their tears. Liliha, or, as now called, Mrs. Boki, at last sunk to the ground from exhaustion, and was under the necessity of being assisted into the house.

I never before was so deeply affected with a wailing scene; and few have ever taken place here, I suspect, in which there was a more general excitement of "the sorrows, joys, and sympathies," which when thus awakened, testify to the "high capacities" of man. After an hour or two, the whole company proceeded to the residence of Kalaimoku, who was too unwell to go out; and shortly afterwards to the chapel to attend prayers, and tender thanks to God for the interesting incident of the day. Before leaving the chapel, governor Boki delivered a short but excellent address, recommending, as the result of his observation and experience abroad, a renewed and devoted attention to the pala-pala and the pule — letters and religion.

mation by letter to lord Byron, that they would receive himself and officers this morning, at the residence of Kailaimoku. Arrangements for the interview were accordingly made, and the occasion has been one of great interest. The landing of his lordship about 12 o'clock, was announced by a salute from the fort. The firing was the signal for attendance at court, and Mr. Bingham and myself proceeded to the place appointed. Mr. Pitt chose to receive the company in his grass-house, rather than in the fine stone building lately erected by him. That fixed on, however, is one of the largest and best built native houses on the island, and being new, was as pleasant, and perhaps more appropriate than the other would have been. The whole apartment was floored with new and handsome mats, and made a pleasant and spacious room of audience. There are four doors, one on each side, and one at each end; that at the south was appointed for the entrance on this occasion. Everything was in readiness when we arrived. At the upper or north end of the house, on an elevation or platform of mats, the top one of which was of very fine texture, and beautifully spotted and striped with stained grass, stood a Chinese sofa, on which the young king and the princess his sister, who came from Lahaina in the Blonde, were seated, both in plain suits of black. Between them, and partly round the princess, lay a splendid garment of yellow feathers, edged with the vandyke pattern, points alternate black and red, and lined with crimson satin.

This article, nine yards long and one yard wide, was made at great expense of time and labor during the past year, and designed to be worn by the princess as a pau, or native female dress, at the reception of her brother Liho-liho, on his expected return. It was the desire of the chiefs that she should wear it, with the wreaths for the head and neck, necessary to form the complete ancient costume of a princess at this interview; but as it was necessary, in order to this, that she should be naked to the waist, nothing could induce her to consent. To escape importunity, she fled to the mission house early in the morning. She wept so as scarcely to be pacified by us, and returned to the chiefs only in time to take her seat, and have it thrown carelessly about her over her European dress, with one end cast across the arm of the sofa. To have seen her in so superb a native costume, would have no doubt been gratifying to the company; but we could but commend and admire the feeling which led her to object and to persist in her purpose. Behind the sofa, and partly inclining over it, were four of the largest kahiles of state, the national insignia of royalty.

On each side of the sofa the chiefs were arranged according to their rank; forming two closely filled lines along each side of the house, entirely to the door of entrance — Kaahumanu and the rest of the queens-dowager occupying the places next to the princess. Mr. Pitt sat in a large crimson chair opposite these last, near the king, but out of, and before, the line of chiefs. On his right were two chairs of the same kind, for lord Byron and Mr. Charlton, and on his left two others for Mr. Bingham and myself. On the opposite side chairs were arranged for the officers of the suite. The prime minister's dress was of black silk; the upper garment, on account of his age and indisposition, being a very full and loose gown. Shortly after we had taken our seats, the procession from the Blonde made its appearance, headed by lord Byron in the full uniform of his rank, supported by Mr. Charlton in his consular costume, and by governor Boki in a rich military suit. All the company, except the king, princess, and Mr. Pitt, upwards of a hundred in number, received him standing, and, being well dressed in full black, made a very respectable appearance.

His lordship after being presented by the consul, to Mr. Pitt, immediately presented to him each of the gentlemen in his suite, about twenty in number, and then in the same manner to the king, princess, and the queens, and after a general salutation to the rest of the chiefs, to Mr. Bingham and myself. Among the persons I now recollect, were lord Frederick Beauclerc, a young son of the duke of St. Albans; the Hon. Mr. Talbot,* a son of the earl of Talbot; the Hon. Mr. Keith, a son of lord Keith; Mr.

Gambier, a nephew of admiral Gambier; the Rev. Mr. Bloxam, chaplain, and Mr. Andrew Bloxam, the mineralogist, nephews of sir Thomas Lawrence, the celebrated artist; Mr. Davis, the surgeon; Mr. M'Rea, the botanist; Mr. Malden, the surveyor; Mr. Dampier, the artist; and Mr. Wilson, the purser.

As soon as they were thus introduced, lord Byron, through Mr. Marini, as interpreter, presented the salutations of the king of England, and his sympathy at the fate of the king and queen; and then ordered a boat's crew in attendance, to bring forward the personal presents of his majesty to the heads of the nation. They consisted of a complete suit of the Windsor uniform, for the young king, with the splendid decorations peculiar to the sovereign's dress. The buttons are of solid gold, having the impression of G. R. in the old English character on them, and the lacings, embroidering, and epaulettes, superb—chapeau and sword to match. The coat, hat, and sword, were immediately tried upon his majesty, and being found to fit most perfectly, lord Byron, partly by way of pleasantry, led him to Kalaimoku and Kaahumanu, and presented him as their king; and putting his hand on his head, bade him to be a good boy, attend well to his studies, and mind all his kind friends the missionaries said to him. For Kalaimoku there was a first-rate gold hunting watch, having the royal arms of Britain richly engraved on one side of the case, and the regent's name on the other. And for Kaahumanu, an elegantly finished silver tea-pot, marked in the same manner as the watch, with the royal arms and her name.

As soon as these articles had been delivered and examined, much to our gratification, Mr. Pitt, entirely of his own will, without the slightest suggestion from us, proposed that we should have prayers of thanksgiving: to which lord Byron and his company most readily and cheerfully agreed; and Mr. Bingham made an excellent prayer, the first part in English, and the latter in the Hawaiian language. At the close, we were happy to receive the congratulations of the party, not only on the degree of civilization and refinement manifested on this occasion, but also on the evidence of Christian belief and practice, which the request of Kalaimoku, and the appearance of the assembly in this act of worship, exhibited. It is an example which I fear the most Christian courts in Christendom would hesitate to exhibit on a similar occasion. After this, a side-table was spread with biscuit and fresh butter, cocoanuts and melons, wine, brandy, and other liquors; and the company left to choose the time of their departure. On leaving the house, several of the gentlemen renewedly expressed their astonishment at the respectability of the levee, and congratulated us afresh, on the prospect we had, as teachers and preachers to so interesting a people.

The trumpet of fame has made the title, genius, character, and even person of the late lord Byron so familiar to you, that I am satisfied the little information I may have it in my power to give, of the successor to the hereditary honors of the family, will not be uninteresting. At present I can only say, that the impression made by a first interview, are most favorable to him as a man and a gentleman. In his person he is tall and slender, fine dark eyes and hair, with strongly marked but open and interesting features, no particular resemblance to his cousin, except in what is usually called a family likeness, unless it may be in the nose, which is of the same style, but not so finely formed as that in engravings of the poet. His eye is inquisitive and penetrating, and shows him to be a man of a decisive and energetic character. In manners he is plain, frank, and cordial; and in conversation perfectly affable and familiar — no affectation of dignity, no hauteur, nothing in looks or expression of countenance, indicative of a trait of character, which, ever since I saw a likeness of the poet, I have best understood by the term, "Byronic curve of the upper lip."

On hearing of the illness of H——, he kindly requested Mr. Davis, the surgeon, to visit her; with the apology to Mr. Davis, that he knew he would be happy in giving his advice to Mrs. S——, and with the assurance to me, that the most unlimited confidence might be placed in the professional abilities of Mr. Davis.

Wednesday, 11. Suitable arrangements having been previously made for the landing of the bodies of the king and queen, at eleven o'clock this morning, the minute-guns of the frigate, with a procession of barges moving from her, became signals to us to be in readiness on the point, to take the places assigned to us in the procession which was to escort the remains of our friends and pupils to a temporary mausoleum. All the chiefs, except Mr. Pitt, who was too much indisposed to have endured the fatigue, with every foreigner of respectability in the neighborhood of Honolulu, were on the ground some time before the barges reached the shore. Mr. Carlton improved the period in forming them in the order in which they were to walk. At twelve o'clock, the procession began to move through a double line of native soldiers, drawn up on each side of the street, from the fort to the chapel, a distance of near half a mile, in the following manner:—

First. Twenty men in the native costume of black, some with the addition of rich feather cloaks, each two bearing an immense feathered staff of state, about thirty feet high, and from one to two feet in diameter, some of black, some of crimson, others of green, and others again of yellow feathers.

Second. The marines of the Blonde, arms reversed.

Third. The band, playing a dead march.

Fourth. The gentlemen of the mission, with the surgeon and chaplain of the frigate. Mr. Bingham, Mr. Bloxam, and myself walked together, the chaplain in full canonical robes; Mr. Bingham and myself in plain dresses, with white scarfs and hat-bands.

Fifth. The bodies of the late king and queen. The coffins containing these are highly finished and splendid; being covered with rich crimson Genoa velvet, studded with gilt nails, and having the corners of each compartment of the sides, ends, and tops, as well as the massive handles, filled with devices of the cherubim. They were placed on two cars, with black canopies, and each drawn by forty of the inferior male chiefs—it being customary to have all services to a dead chief of high rank performed by chiefs only—in European dresses of deep mourning.

Sixth. The young king, in his Windsor uniform, with crape on his arm and sword-hilt, and the princess his sister in full black: the former supported by Mr. Charlton,

Seventh. The rest of the high chiefs, according to their rank and relationship to the deceased, two abreast, with an officer of the Blonde, in full dress, on each side.

Eighth. The inferior chief women, in European dresses of black.

Ninth. The foreigners, mercantile agents, residents, and sea-captains in port; followed by about one hundred of the men of the Blonde, in a uniform dress of white jackets and trowsers, white hats, and shoes bound with black, and black handkerchiefs and hatbands: the whole making a most respectable, and, for the Sandwich islands at least, a truly splendid display.

The great weight of the coffins, each body having three, one of lead, one of mahogany, and one of oak, rendered it almost impracticable to have them taken into the chapel, which had been hung in black for the occasion. On reaching the door, therefore, the procession, instead of entering the building, fell into a circle around the cars, and Mr. Bloxam read a part of the burial service of the Episcopal church, and Mr. Bingham made an address in the native language; after which the procession again formed, and returned down the street a few rods, to the gate leading to Kalaimoku's residence, situated in a cultivated enclosure of some eight or ten acres. Here, as it passed by a circuitous way, it showed to the best advantage.

On reaching the door of the house, the feather-bearers, marines, and band opened to the right and left, and Mr. Bloxam, Mr. Bingham, and myself, entered the habitation about to be converted into a tomb. I scarce knew when I have been more tenderly affected. It was the audience room, in which but a day or two before, lord Byron and his suite had been presented; but how greatly was its whole appearance altered! A low and well-defined arch had been thrown over the lofty roof, converting it into a long vaulted hall, every part of which, even to the pillars running through the middle, was entirely covered with black. Its only furniture was a large platform at one end, on which was to be deposited all that remained of Kamehamalu and Liholiho: and the only person in it was Ka-laimoku, standing to receive the lifeless bodies of those he had ever called and loved as his children. His dress was the same as on Saturday ; but his appearance even more venerable and interesting. He received our salutations in agitated silence : the trembling hand, the quivering lip, the hasty and disturbed pressure of his handkerchief to the eyes and forehead, all expressing deep emotion of heart. He permitted himself to be led to a seat, while the coffins, each borne by twelve men of the Blonde, were placed on the platform. Immediately after, the rest of the company entered, and formed numerous groups around the apartment ; while, accompanied by the band drawn up on one side, we sung the native funeral anthem to the tune of Pleyel's hymn, and Mr. Bingham made a short prayer in the same language.

This scene was by far the most striking and impressive furnished by the occasion. The sable drapery of the room, the full mourning suits of the mass, interspersed and relieved by the rich and glittering uniforms of the officers, the handsome half-mourning dresses and white plumes of Mrs. Charlton and Mrs. Taylor her sister, madam Boki, and one of the young queens-dowager, who has lately become a bride, with a variety of other becoming and appropriate dresses, the melancholy tones of the instruments, and the solemn truths of the chant in the chamber of the dead, combined to make it a truly interesting and affecting spectacle.

Thus, under the mournful reverberations of the minute-gun, have been received, and peacefully deposited on their native shores, the king and the queen of the Sandwich islands, whose short reign has been marked by epochs no less momentous than the abolition of a cruel system of idolatry ; the introduction of the elements of literature and the arts and usages of civilized life ; and, above all, the promulgation of the gospel, with all the bright hopes and eternal retributions of Christianity ! To these dark monarchs of this western archipelago, in the gloomy mansion of their repose, I gave one more tear—one more tear, in remembrance of the better characteristics which not unfrequently shone through their follies and their sins ; one more tear for the attachment I had felt, and the prayers

I had offered, for them ; one more tear for the early disappointment of the hopes I had entertained, that they would return to their rude subjects, from the bright regions of Christendom, only "to point to Heaven, and to lead the way." I shudder to think, that, so imperfectly instructed, so partially reclaimed, and, as it is to be feared, so little prepared, they have been launched into eternity, and have stood before God !

Sabbath evening, 22. Governor Boki, as a member of the church of Christ, joined us to-day in the breaking of bread and the drinking of wine, in remembrance of Him who died that sinners might live. He was baptized six years since, by the chaplain of the French discovery ship, the corvette Uranie, M. Freycinet, commander, and received the communion in England, and on board the Blonde. So far as we have information, he is a sincere friend to Christianity and practical piety, and is without reproach in his moral character, though once exceedingly dissipated. We had a most interesting religious interview with him and his brother Kalaimoku, this evening, and cannot but hope that the last, who was also baptized by the Romish priest, has, in this, emphatically, the eleventh hour of his life, been baptized of the Holy Ghost. It is now six months since, according to his own statement, he forsook all sin, and has lived the life and indulged the hope of a Christian. After a long and most pleasant conversation on his own case, his words were, "You tell me what the belief and the feelings of a real Christian are, and my thought is, that I now am one — but I do not know : look you at my life and actions, and tell me whether I live, as well as think and feel, rightly ; watch me in my life, and then tell me what your thought is."

The confessions he made of his former habits and sins, were a shocking testimony to the pollutions of the heathen, and would have crimsoned the cheeks, and forever silenced the tongues and pens of those who are so enthusiastic in their encomiums on the purity, simplicity, and innocence of untutored nature, and so lavish in their censure of those who attempt to interrupt their primeval felicity, and destroy their peace, by the precepts of Christianity and the doctrines of salvation !

Thursday, 26. The physicians having recommended a change of air, as most likely to benefit H——'s health, lord Byron has most kindly assigned us accommodations in the Blonde, for a trip to the harbor of Waiakea, at Hilo, on Hawaii, where he is going for a month, to refit and to explore the windward of that island, with the intention of returning to this port again. It is uncertain on what day she may sail, though probably in the course of a week.

The very favorable impression of the character of this nobleman made at a first interview, has been greatly strengthened and deepened by after-intercourse. To the apparent quickness, vigor, and cultivation of intellect, which one would naturally expect to see in a Byron, he adds a kindness of heart and benevolence of disposition that would command respect and win affection under any name. Few men of his rank, and indeed any rank, would have completed the objects of his mission to the islands in so condescending and unexceptionable a manner; and the influence he is exerting, is calculated to open, more fully than ever, to this people a way for the introduction of all the illimitable blessings of civilization and Christianity.

It is with no inconsiderable pleasure, that I anticipate, from the excursion to Hawaii, a prolonged intercourse with himself, and some of his immediate friends of the Blonde, with whom I have become more particularly acquainted.

Nothing I have yet known on missionary ground, causes me so deeply to feel the sacrifice of our situation, as the occasional society of such men. The lowliness of our habitation, the plainness and poverty of our table, the known and unknown inconveniences and privations of our whole establishment — never rouse the recollections of mind and heart, excited by the intercourse of a week, a day, an hour, with the polished, the intelligent, the amiable, the virtuous; those who have heads to think, hearts to feel, characters to respect, and conversation and manners to win. When we meet and when we part with such, at this extremity of the globe, we feel that we are cut off from some of the choicest enjoyments of life.

Sabbath evening, 29. It is possible the frigate may sail before the return of the Sabbath: and designing to leave both the children at this place with B—— and a native nurse, we thought it advisable to have our daughter baptized to-day. It being impracticable for H—— to go to the chapel, she was removed to a sofa in the front room of our little cottage, immediately after the English service in the morning: here, the members of the mission, joined by the British consul's family, and two or three gentlemen of the Blonde, who had permission of absence from worship on board ship, assembled to witness the solemnity. Mr. Bingham administered the ordinance, and by the name of HARRIETTE BRADFORD, consecrated to the service, and commended to the guardianship and salvation of our covenant God, the germ of immortality committed to our arms. May she inherit the prayers and the piety of the pilgrim ancestor whose name, with that of her mother, she bears; and if spared to years of maturity, may her praise, like his, be in all the churches. The very critical state of H—— made the scene tenderly interesting. It is not improbable that this may be the last, as it is the first, external act of duty and piety she may ever be permitted to exercise towards the helpless object of her love.

H. B. M. ship Blonde, at sea, June 5, 1825. At eleven o'clock, yesterday morning, a messenger from lord Byron came to inform us that he was in readiness, on the point, to take us on board the frigate in his boat. H—— was carried down in an arm-chair, and his lordship's gig being in waiting, we were immediately rowed off to the vessel, a distance of two miles, in the open roads. The possibility that H—— might not live to return to Oahu, made the separation from her children a severe trial. We left them, however, with the persuasion, that they will receive every kind and affectionate attention from our faithful friend B——, and from the ladies of the station.

The anchor was not taken, until four o'clock, until which time, H—— remained on a sofa in lord Byron's cabin: but beginning to be slightly affected by the motion of the ship after she was under sail, before we sat down to dinner, she was removed to her own apartment, adjoining the dining-room. The captain, and all the gentlemen of the ship, are exceedingly polite and attentive; and our whole situation is made by them as pleasant as possible. We shall feel ourselves under very lasting obligations to lord Byron, every development of whose character increases our respect, gratitude, and love. He is at all times affable and communicative; but while at the tea-table this evening, where we were joined by the chaplain, Mr. Andrew Bloxam, his brother, and Mr. Dampier, the artist, he exhibited powers of conversation which must make him a charming companion to his intimate friends and family circle. He is a great favorite with the chiefs; and in order most fully to secure every attention and service to himself and ship, Kaahumanu and her sister Hoapiliwahine, accompany him to Hawaii. Mr. Goodrich of the mission, who has paid a short visit at Oahu, improves this opportunity also, of returning to his station at Waiakea.

The Blonde is a forty-six gun ship, of fine model, and perfectly new, this being her first voyage. Lord Byron's accommodations consist of an after-cabin, fitted up as a reading and sitting-room, in which tea is served; a forward or large cabin, used as a breakfast and dining-room; and a sleeping and dressing cabin. The whole are substantially and handsomely finished and furnished, particularly the after-cabin. In this there is a beautifully engraved likeness of his majesty George IV., from a full-length portrait by sir Thomas Lawrence; a half-length portrait of the present lady Byron; and one of the same size of Moore, the poet, who is an intimate friend of the Byron family.

Of lady Byron, we have heard an admirable account. The expression of countenance in her portrait is uncommonly ingenuous and prepossessing, and, in addition to all that is amiable and benevolent in disposition, she is said, by those whom we have heard speak of her, to be pious; the simplicity of her dress and whole bearing indicate a mind and heart little devoted to the mere vanities of high and fashionable life.

The library is in the after-cabin, and is of a character one would more expect to meet in a clergyman's study, than in a post-captain's cabin; consisting principally of the British classical writers, with standard works on morals and religion.

Saturday evening, 11. After being delayed all day yesterday between Maui and Hawaii, we this morning succeeded in doubling the north point of the latter island, and have been delighted with the romantic and verdant scenery of the windward side of Hawaii, including the precipices and waterfalls in the neighborhood of the beautiful valleys of Wai-Pio, and Wai-Manu. One cascade, of which we had a full view for some time, could not have been less than six hundred feet in height, extending almost from the top of a mountain to its base. The quantity of water was small, but sufficiently great to be very beautiful, as in its descent it foamed from cliff to cliff, and from precipice to precipice. The windward or eastern parts of all the mountains are much more picturesque than the leeward, and abound in romantic and beautiful scenes, peculiarly refreshing from their verdure, to an eye long accustomed to the parched and dreary aspect of the opposite sides.

Lord Byron and myself are usually alone at the breakfast table, and his conversation then is less general, as to subjects, and often more interesting than at any other time. It was particularly so this morning, happening to turn on his late distinguished predecessor in the barony of the Byrons. He had often before spoken of him as a writer, and, in reference to his later publications, in terms of unqualified reprehension; but now his remarks regarded him as a man, and a member of his own family. They were of the same age, same education, and on terms of the closest intimacy until after the poet's marriage.

The conversation also embraced Newstead Abbey, the ancient family mansion of the Byrons. Although, previous to the death of its late celebrated possessor, it passed into the hands of a new master, and has undergone most extensive and costly repairs, no change whatever has been made in its most attractive, and, if I may use the term—Byronic features. Its ancient baronial as well as monastic character has been preserved, by Col. Wildman, in his improvements, with as much reverence for the family of the noble bard as if he were of the same blood, or as if his only object were to consecrate the pile to the name and memory of the genius who once dwelt within its halls.

The extraordinary gifts, popularity, and whole character of its late proprietor, has thrown an interest around it that few private mansions can boast; and it must, ever hereafter, be an object of curiosity, at least, to the scholar and the traveler.

Lord Byron has an estate in the vicinity of Newstead, and was kind enough to say, if I should ever visit England, he would be happy to see me in Nottinghamshire; with the promise of accompanying me to the Abbey. The additional if, puts the event, humanly speaking, among the improbabilities of my life; but should such ever be the case, I am sure the gratification I might receive from treading the halls and cloisters of Newstead, would not arise from any feeling of veneration for its former master. I admire the powers and brilliancy of his genius, less than I abhor their later monstrous perversion and prostitution.

Our nearness to the land and mountains gave us a beautiful sunset scene and evening, so much so as to call into exercise the poetic talent of our friend Mr. Bloxam, and secure the following effusion, which I found enclosed in a polite note on my writing-desk, on our return from the after-cabin.

COASTING ALONG THE ISLAND OF HAWAII.

Saturday Evening, June 11, 1825.

Eve, gentle Eve, the mourner's friend art thou,
Calming his lonely heart, his altered brow;
Bidding again his former pleasures live
With added charms, which thou alone canst give.
Seen through thy misty veil, the years gone by
Are dearest far to pensive memory.
When thy soft blending hues, along the west,
Calmly reposing in their tranquil rest,
Strew Hesper's cradle with their rosy light,
And shed bright tinges o'er the brow of night, —
Then let me hail thee! for thy dewy star
Opens the gates of blessedness afar;
And shining bright, and brighter from above,
Tells of a land where all is peace and love.

Fairest is Eve, where mild Ausonia's sky
Owns her bright hues; and where the zephyr's sigh
Breathes the sweet tones of melody or song,
Or bears the fragrance of the groves along.

Lovely is Eve, where Britain's western cloud
Throws round the sun her purple glowing shroud,

While even childhood, ere it sinks to rest,
Turns its blue eye enraptured to the west.

Where Hawaii links her seven-fold chain,*
And where the leader of her giant band †
Flings his broad shadows proudly o'er the land,
And soaring seeks among the snow-charged cloud
His time-worn forehead's haughty height to shroud.
He sees the twilight shed her softening dyes
On Maui's mountains that contiguous rise;
While his hoar brow is bright with hues of day,
And glowing radiant 'neath the sun's last ray,
With timid hand may evening scarcely dare
O'er his dark breast to draw her mantle fair.
But who at this soft hour is gaining now
The heights that frown o'er yonder vale below,
Who, winding down the craggy pathway there
In shadowy distance, seems some form of air!
'Tis he — the pastor of the numerous flock
Who wait his coming under yonder rock:
Where, far from mild Religion's soothing ray,
Pale Superstition late held direful sway:
But now — mysterious words! — he speaks of Heaven,
Of mercy — hope — and love — of sins forgiven:
He speaks of HIM, omnipotent to save,
Who died — who lives triumphant o'er the grave:
E'en now the savage, with uplifted eyes,
Drinks the sweet words, "Christ is our sacrifice."
No more, for past omissions to atone,
He bows to forms of wood or gods of stone;
But bends the knee, and humbly hopes to trace
Some glorious tidings of redeeming grace;
While gently stealing o'er the twilight dim,
Falls the soft cadence of the evening hymn.

Now all is peace. Each sound has died away
The savage seeks his couch, till break of day
Again shall summon him his vows to pay.

O blest seclusion! Solitude how blest!
Yes — soon on Mounakea's shaggy breast,
(Unless I idly dream) a Fane shall rise
To HIM, the great TRUENE, who rules the earth and skies.

The whole is creditable to the writer, as an impromptu; and the latter part a pleasing and lively picture of the ordinary evening worship held by the missionaries with the natives at the different stations.

Mission house, Hilo, Monday, June 13. Yesterday morning, at the break of day, we were farther from the harbor of Waiakea than we had, the evening before, expected to be ; and lord Byron gave orders to stand off the land until the usual worship of the Sabbath was performed. The whole crew, in clean dresses, occupied seats fronting the quarter-deck, where chairs were arranged for the officers. In addition to the morning service of prayers, at different parts of which the band played pieces of sacred music, Mr. Bloxam gave us a very excellent sermon on repentance. The whole was marked by much order and solemnity, and attended to by many with great devoutness, especially by the captain and our friend the surgeon.

As we approached the land after church, we were greatly delighted with the verdure, luxuriance, and beauty of the landscape opening to us in the neighborhood of the bay of Hilo. The shore had lost in a great measure the abrupt and precipitous character of the coast along which we had been sailing on Saturday, and was only edged by a low cliff, richly mantled with shrubbery and creeping plants, and ornamented with several beautiful cascades. These, in connexion with the breakers, which ran high upon the rocks, often dashing their spray many feet in the air, gave the cliff an uncommonly picturesque appearance. The land rises gradually from the cliff, to the distance of ten or fifteen miles, to a heavy wood encircling the base of Mounakea. Though in a state of nature, this large district has the appearance of cultivation, being an open country covered with grass, and beautifully studded and sprinkled with clumps and groves and single trees, in the manner of park scenery, with a cottage here and there peeping from beneath their rich foliage. The mountains were entirely covered with clouds, or the prospect would have been rendered more delightful from their sublimity. Such was the scene on our right, as we sailed close along the breakers to the narrow channel forming the entrance to the harbor, the gentlemen of the Blonde exclaiming, "This is more like English scenery than anything we have yet seen." and we were equally ready to say, "This looks something like America — it has some of the features of a civilized land."

The channel is formed by the cliff on the right, and a sunken coral reef on the left, the point of which comes within two or three hundred rods of the shore, making it necessary for ships to pass so close to the breakers as to appear in a dangerous situation. Seamen, however, consider it perfectly safe. The reef runs in a curved direction from the point at the channel, about half a mile to the east, where it joins a romantic little islet covered with cocoanut trees; from that fact, called "Cocoanut island." A small channel runs between this and the main land, which is low, and sweeps round to the western cliffs in a beautifully curved sandy beach of about two miles, making the form of the bay that of a flattened horseshoe. The beach is covered with varied vegetation, and ornamented by clumps and single trees of lofty cocoanut, among which the habitations of the natives are seen, not in a village, but scattered everywhere among the plantations, like farm houses in a thickly inhabited country. The mission houses were pointed out to us, pleasantly situated near the water, about the middle of the curvature forming the head of the bay. At a very short distance from the beach, bread-fruit trees were seen in heavy groves, in every direction, intersected with the pandanus and kukui, or candle-tree, the hibiscus and the acacia, &c. The tops of these rising gradually one above another, as the country gently ascends towards the mountains in the interior, presented for twenty or thirty miles in the southeast a delightful forest scene, totally different in extent from anything I had before witnessed on the islands.

The Blonde anchored in the centre of the bay, and shortly after dinner the barge was lowered, to carry us to our friends on shore. After rowing half a mile, we entered a beautiful fresh-water creek, which winds its way close to the missionary enclosure, and in a few minutes were welcomed to the cottage of Mr. Ruggles, where Mrs. Goodrich had resided during her husband's absence. They were greatly rejoiced at the unexpected visit of H— and myself to them in their remote and solitary abode, though their sympathy was deeply excited by the cause, and by the evidence of deep-seated disease, visible in the countenance and person of their beloved friend.

The gentlemen who accompanied us were so much pleased with the freshness and verdure of the shore, the simplicity and rural beauty of the gardens which surround the humble dwellings of our companions, that they permitted the barge to return to the ship without them, and spent the afternoon and took tea with us.

Besides a visit from the chaplain and surgeon to-day we have had the pleasure of a call from lord Byron, and the first lieutenant, Mr. Ball, an amiable and kind man, and a particular favorite of the captain. They remained to tea with us, and expressed themselves highly delighted with Hilo.

Tuesday, 14. The sunrise view of Mounakea yesterday was so charming, that I made an exertion to have H—— witness it this morning, before he should be enrapt in his daily robe of clouds. The morning was delightful, and the whole atmosphere perfectly unobscured. The extensive region of upland country intervening between us and the base of the mountain, was gleaming in the brightness of the early sun, with all the freshness and verdure of an American landscape in June; while the mountain in its whole extent of breadth and height, glowed in the richest purple, except where a broad line of ice and snow, still resting on its sides and summit, added a cresting of silver. This scenery on our left, with the bay and its cliffs and islands, and beautifully defined beach, and the Blonde at anchor immediately before us, and the ocean in the distance, made a picture highly calculated, in connection with the purity and brightness of a summer morning, to revive the spirits and strengthen the nerves of one who for more than three months had scarcely seen anything but the dreary walls of her sick chamber. After breakfast, supported by my arm, she, with feeble and tottering step, walked also through the garden which separates the two cottages, and was charmed with a variety of flowers, shrubbery, herbs, and vegetables, which Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Ruggles have collected and nursed, until they are beginning to flourish exuberantly. Among the flowers, I saw many, the seeds of which I brought to the islands; that which is most prized by the natives, is the purple globe amaranthus. They form beautiful wreaths from its blossoms, and you scarcely pass a plantation without seeing a bed of it cultivated for that purpose.

This afternoon I joined lord Byron and party in a visit to a large fish-pond, of which the creek or river is the outlet. It is a pretty sheet of water, in its natural state excepting strong stone dams to prevent the escape of the fish. These are kabu to all but high chiefs; and no one of rank having lived here lately, the whole pond is literally alive with the finest of mullet. The surface of the water is almost in a constant ripple from their motions, and hundreds can be taken at any time by a single cast of a small net. Expressing our astonishment at the sight, sir Joseph Banks,* who, from understanding and speaking some English, has been appointed by her majesty interpreter, caterer, gentleman in waiting, &c. to lord Byron, very seriously says, "O dis nothing, sir — noting — I see him before now; — he so full fish, I see one man, he fall backwards in him, he no sink at all!"

After satisfying our curiosity here, we rowed down the creek and across the bay, to another stream on the western side of the harbor, called Wailuku — river of destruction — where the ships get their water. The entrance to this river is highly romantic and beautiful, the banks being precipitous and rocky, and covered with a variety of vegetation. About a hundred yards above the beach, it opens into a still deep basin, encircled by high cliffs. Into this basin the whole stream is projected by two cascades, the upper about twenty feet, and the lower about eight feet, both rushing over their respective ledges of rock in unbroken sheets. A rude bridge crosses the stream just above the falls; and it is a favorite amusement of the natives to plunge from it, or from the adjoining rocks, into the rapids, and pass headforemost over both falls, into the lower basin. Some of them were engaged in this sport when we arrived, for the gratification of lieutenants Keith, Talbot, and Gambier, whom we found there. The accession of our party collected a greater crowd, and the cliffs and rocks were quickly covered with men, women, and children, many of whom not only passed over the falls in the manner described, but jumped also from a height of thirty, forty, and fifty feet, into the basin, which, though small, is of very great depth.

The inhabitants of Hilo are in a state of much greater simplicity than those in many other parts of the islands, owing to the infrequency of the visits of ships and a less degree of the corrupting influence of foreign example in vice. More of the primitive character of the islanders — its artless diffidence and timidity — is preceptible, than in the natives of Maui, Oahu, &c. And though these traits are far from being unmingled with licentiousness and many of the abominations of heathenism, still they are more pleasing than the impudence and unblushing vulgarity observable in those who have had long intercourse with the abandoned seamen and vagabonds who frequent the less remote parts.

We passed near the chapel on our return. It stands almost midway between the mission house and the watering place, close to the beach, and although small, is well built, and neatly thatched. The thatching of the houses in general, here, is altogether more neat and beautiful than at the leeward islands. It is made from the leaves of the padanus, and so put on as to conceal all the rudeness of the timber and sticks on the inside; while on the outside, a deep edging of fern, along the peak and ends of the roof, and down the corners of the house — having something of the effect of the cornice and pilaster — give a finished and ornamental appearance not seen in the common grass huts. The ease with which stout timber can be procured here, enables them also to build their dwellings much larger than at Lahaina and Honolulu, where the wood most accessible is small and crooked.

Wednesday, 15. The religious instructions, &c. at this station, are similar in their forms to those given at the stations with which I have been most familiar; but owing to the small number who have hitherto attended them, all the meetings, except preaching on the Sabbath, have been and still are held, in one of the houses of the brethren. Kaahumanu is very zealous, here, in promoting the interests of the mission, and will doubtless do great good by her example. The people are astonished at the change in her character, and a good evidence of its extent is that she is everywhere called by them, "the new Kaahumanu." At the usual Wednesday afternoon meeting to-day, at the close of the sermon, she delivered a very animated address, prohibiting all wickedness, and exhorting those present to follow the teachings of the missionaries. She always appears desirous of exerting her influence in favor of the new system, and of a rigid conformity to all its requisitions: and her authority is so unbounded, and her example so powerful, that doubtless wherever she goes she will be instrumental of great good.

Sabbath evening, 19. Between the native services to-day, I administered the sacrament of the Supper to our little number, all of whom, excepting Mr. Goodrich and myself, had long been denied the enjoyment of that high and holy ordinance: H—— from her long confinement, and the members of this station from the want of some one authorized to break unto them the bread of life and pour out the waters of salvation. The occasion proved highly interesting and refreshing, especially to our afflicted one. Many natives attended, crowding the corners of the room, and with seriousness and propriety seemed to be inquiring what these things meant. Poor creatures! may the time not be far distant when multitudes of them shall not only witness, but partake, with saving knowledge, of these rich streams of mercy and of grace!

Monday, 20. On Saturday evening, while with the gentlemen of the Blonde, Lieut. Malden, the surveyor, who shortly after the arrival of the frigate, chartered one of the native schooners for the purpose of facilitating the operations of his department, arrived from Oahu, bringing letters, with the unwelcome and afflicting intelligence of the death of Evarts Bingham. The news was hardly a surprise, for we left him very ill; but it was melancholy and oppressive: especially, from the magnitude of the bereavement to our invaluable and warm friends, Mr. and Mrs. Bingham. He was their only son, and from his birth had been the object of fond solicitude and unwearied care. Mr. Bloxam happening, at the time, to have a blank book of mine in his room, wrote the following beautiful lines on the event—

"WEEP NOT, THY SON LIVETH."

Sweet stranger, scarce thy laughing eye
 Had hailed the rising sun,
 With that soft gaze of infancy
 Which tells the enraptured parent nigh
 Thy playfulness begun ;
 When other scenes than gave thee birth
 Were thine — fair vanished son of earth.

The white robe o'er thy limbs was spread,
 Meet vesture, saint, for thee,
 Whose soul to brighter scenes was fled,
 To form the train of holy dead,
 The dead of infancy —
 Who wash in their Redeemer's blood
 Have early sought their parent God.

The flowers which love had gently strewn
 Around thee — still so dear —
 These flowers were not so fully blown
 As that bright palm branch now thine own,
 Which 'tis thy lot to bear —
 Oh ! in the last great day, be mine
 A chaplet but as fair as thine !

EXCURSION TO THE VOLCANO OF HAWAII.

Mission house at Byron's bay, Saturday, July 2, 1825.
 A party was formed a few days since to visit the great volcano of Kilauea, and set off early on Monday, the 27th ult. I was happy enough to be one of the number ; and while the incidents of the excursion are fresh in my mind, I hasten to give you an account of them.

Every preparation having been previously made, we left the harbor shortly after sunrise. The uncommon beauty of the morning proved a true omen of the delightful weather with which we were favored during the whole of our absence. The rich coloring of Mounakea in the early sun, never called forth higher or more general admiration. The brightness of the sky, the purity of the air, the freshness, sweetness, and cheerfulness of all nature, excited a buoyancy of spirit favorable to the accomplishment of the walk of forty miles, which lay between us and the object of our journey.

Lord Byron had invited Mr. Ruggles, who was also of the party, and myself, to an early cup of coffee with him, that we might all proceed together from his lodgings; but besides the inconvenience of crossing the river, it would have considerably lengthened our walk. We therefore chose to take some refreshments at home, and at an appointed signal we proceeded up one side of the stream and great fish-pond, while the gentlemen of the Blonde followed a path up the other. We met on a rising ground at the end of two miles, and found the company from the opposite side to consist of lord Byron, Mr. Ball the first lieutenant, Mr. Malden the surveyor, Mr. Bloxam the chaplain, Mr. Andrew Bloxam the mineralogist, Mr. Davis the surgeon, Mr. Dampier the artist, Mr. White, a son of the earl of Bantry, and Mr. Powell midshipman. Lord Frederick Beauclerc was to have been of the number, but was detained by sickness.

Malo, a principal chief of Hilo, had been appointed by Kaahumanu caterer general; and about one hundred natives under his authority attended with our luggage and provisions. Sir Joseph, or, as more familiarly styled, "Joe Banks," was also in attendance, in his diversified capacity. The regent had left nothing undone to render the trip as comfortable as her authority could make it. Neat temporary houses for refreshment and sleeping, had been erected by her command at intervals of twelve or fifteen miles, and the people of the only inhabited district through which we were to pass, had, the week before, been apprised of the journey of "the British chief," with strict orders to have an abundance of pigs, fowls, kalo, potatoes, and fruit, in readiness, for the supply of his company. When assembled, we formed quite a numerous body, and from the variety of character and dress, the diversity in the burdens of the natives, bundles, tin-cases, portmanteaus, calabashes, kettles, buckets, pans, &c. &c. with two hammocks by the way of equipage swung on long poles, borne each by four men — one for lord Byron, in case the fatigue of walking should affect his leg, recently injured by a kick from a horse at Oahu, and the other for the chaplain — made, while marching in single file along the narrow winding path which formed our only road, quite a grotesque and novel appearance.

For the first four miles the country was open and uneven, and beautifully sprinkled with clumps, groves, and single trees of the bread-fruit, pandanus, and candle-tree. We then came to a wood, four miles in width, the outskirts of which exhibited a rich and delightful foliage. It was composed principally of the candle-tree, whose whitish leaves and blossoms afforded a fine contrast to the dark green of the various parasitical plants which hung in luxuriant festoons and pendants from their very tops to the ground, forming thick and deeply shaded bowers round their trunks. The interior was far less interesting, presenting nothing but an impenetrable thicket, on both sides of the path. This was excessively rough and fatiguing, consisting entirely of loose and pointed pieces of lava, which, from their irregularity and sharpness, not only cut and tore our shoes, but constantly endangered our feet and ankles. The high brake, ginger, &c. which border and overhang the path, were filled with the rain of the night, and added greatly, from their wetness, to the unpleasantness of the walk. An hour and a half, however, saw us safely through, and refreshing ourselves in the charming groves with which the wood was here again bordered.

The whole of the way, from this place to within a short distance of the volcano, is very much of one character. The path, formed of black lava, so smooth in some places as to endanger falling, and still shewing the configuration of the molten stream as it had rolled down the gradual descent of the mountain, leads midway through a strip of open uncultivated country, from three to five miles wide, skirted on both sides by a ragged and stunted wood, and covered with fern, grass, and low shrubs, principally a species of the whortleberry. The fruit of this, of the size of a small gooseberry, and of a bright yellow color, tinged on one side with red, was very abundant, and, though of insipid taste, refreshing from its juice. There are no houses near the path, but the thatch of a cottage was occasionally observed peeping from the edge of the wood; and here and there the white smoke of a kindling fire curled above the thick foliage of the trees. Far on the right and west, Mounaloa and Mounakea were distinctly visible: and at an equal distance, on the left and east, the ocean, with its horizon — from the height at which we viewed it — mingling with the sky.

We dined thirteen miles from the bay, under a large candle-tree, on a bed of brake, collected and spread by a party of people who had been waiting by the wayside to see the "alii nui mai Perekania mai," "the great chief from Britain." About two miles farther, we came to the houses erected for our lodgings the first night. Thinking it, however, too early to lie by for the day, after witnessing a dance performed by a company from the neighboring settlements, we hastened on, intending to sleep at the next houses, ten miles distant; but night overtaking us before we reached them, just as darkness set in we turned aside a few rods to the ruins of two huts, the sticks only of which were remaining. The natives, however, soon covered them with fern, the leaves of the kukui, &c., a quantity of which they also spread on the ground, before spreading the mats which were to be our beds.

Our arrival and encampment produced quite a picturesque and lively scene; for the islanders, who are not fond of such forced marches as we had made during the day, were more anxious for repose than ourselves, and proceeded with great alacrity to make preparations for the night. The darkness, as it gathered round us, rendered more gloomy by a heavily clouded sky, made the novelty of our situation still more striking. Behind the huts, in the distance, an uplifted torch of the blazing kukui-nut here and there indistinctly revealed the figures and costume of many, spreading their couches under the bushes in the open air. A large lamp suspended from the centre of our rude lodge, entirely open in front, presented us in bolder relief, seated a la Turc round lord Byron, who poured "to each the cup that cheers but not inebriates;" the more curious of our dusky companions, both male and female, meanwhile pressing in numbers round our circle, as if anxious to "catch the manners living as they rose." A large fire of brush-wood, at some distance in front, exhibited the objects of the foreground in still stronger lights and shadows. Groups of both sexes, and all ages, were seated or standing round the fire, wrapped up from the chilliness of the evening air, in their large kiheis or mantles, of white, black, green, yellow, and red; some smoking, some throwing in and others snatching from the embers a fish or potato, or other article of food; some giving a loud halloo, in answer to the call of a straggler just arriving; others wholly taken up with the proceedings of the sailors cooking our supper; and all chattering with the volubility of so many magpies.

By daylight the next morning, we were on the road again, and shortly after met lieutenant Talbot, Mr. Wilson the purser, and Mr. M'Rea the botonist, with their guides and attendants, on their return; they having preceded us three days in the same excursion. As they intended to reach the frigate in time for dinner, they stopped only long enough to say the volcano was in fine action, and highly worth visiting. At nine o'clock we passed the last houses put up for our accommodation on the way; and at eleven o'clock had arrived within three miles of the object of our curiosity. For the last hour the scenery had become more interesting; our path was skirted, occasionally, with groves and clusters of trees, and fringed with a greater variety of vegetation. Here also the smoke from the volcano was first discovered, settling in light fleecy clouds to the southwest. Our resting place at this time, was a delightful spot, commanding a full view of the wide extent of country over which we had traveled, and beyond and around it, the ocean, which, from the vast and almost undistinguished extent of its horizon, seemed literally an "illimitable sea." The smooth greensward, under the shade of a majestic acacia, almost encircled by thickets of a younger growth, afforded a refreshing couch on which to take our luncheon. Here we saw the first bed of strawberry vines, but without finding any fruit. We tarried but a few moments, and then hurried on to the grand object before us.

The nearer we approached, the more heavy the columns of smoke appeared, and roused to intenseness our curiosity to behold their origin. Under the influence of this excitement, we hastened forward with rapid steps, regardless of the heat of a noonday sun, and the fatigue of a walk of thirty-six miles, already accomplished. A few minutes before twelve o'clock, we came suddenly on the brink of a precipice, one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet high, covered with shrubbery and trees. Descending this by a path almost perpendicular, we crossed a plain half a mile in width, enclosed, except in the direction we were going, by the cliff behind us, and found ourselves a second time on the top of a precipice four hundred feet high, also covered with bushes and trees. This, like the former, swept off to the right and left, enclosing in a semi-circular form, a level space about a quarter of a mile broad; immediately beyond which lay the tremendous abyss of our search, emitting volumes of vapor and smoke; and laboring and groaning, as if in inexpressible agony from the raging of the conflicting elements within its bosom. We stood but a moment to take this first distant glance, then hastily descended the almost perpendicular height, and crossed the plain to the very brink of the crater.

There are scenes to which description, and even painting can do no justice; and in conveying any adequate impression of which, they must ever fail. Of such, an elegant traveler rightly says, "the height, the depth, the length, the breadth, the combined aspect, may all be correctly given, but the mind of the reader will remain untouched by the emotions of admiration and sublimity which the eye-witness experiences." That which here burst on our sight was emphatically of this kind; and to behold it without singular and deep emotion, would demand a familiarity with the more terrible phenomena of nature, which few have the opportunity of acquiring. Standing at an elevation of one thousand five hundred feet, we looked into a black and horrid gulf, not less than eight miles in circumference, so directly beneath us that, in appearance, we might by a single leap have plunged into its lowest depth. The hideous immensity itself, independent of the many frightful images which it embraced, almost caused an involuntary closing of the eyes against it. But when to the sight is added the appalling effect of the various unnatural and fearful noises, the muttering and sighing, the groaning and blowing, the every agonized struggling of the mighty action within — as a whole, it is too horrible ! And for the first moment I felt like one of my friends, who, on reaching the brink, recoiled, and covered his face, exclaiming : “ Call it weakness, or what you please, but I cannot look again ! ” It was sufficient employment for the afternoon, simply to sit and gaze on the scene ; and though some of our party strolled about, and one or two descended a short distance into the crater, the most of our number deferred all investigation until the next morning.

From what I have already said, you will perceive that this volcano differs, in one respect, from most others of which we have accounts. The crater, instead of being the truncated top of a mountain, distinguishable in every direction at a distance, is an immense chasm in an upland country, near the base of the mountain Mounaloea — approached, not by ascending a cone, but by descending two vast terraces ; and not visible from any point at a greater distance than half a mile, a circumstance which, no doubt, from the suddenness of the arrival, adds much to the effect of a first look from the brink.

It is probable that it was originally a cone, but assumed its present aspect, it may be centuries ago, from the falling in of the whole summit. Of this, the precipices we descended, which entirely encircle the crater in circumferences of fifteen and twenty miles, give strong evidence. They have unquestionably been formed by the sinking of the mountain, whose foundations had been undermined by the devouring flames beneath. In the same manner, one half of the present depth of the crater has, at no very remote period, been formed. About midway from the top, a ledge of lava, in some places only a few feet, but in others many rods wide, extends entirely round, at least as far as an examination has been made, forming a kind of gallery, to which you can descend in two or three places, and walk as far as the smoke, settling at the south end, will permit. This offset bears incontestable marks of having once been the level of the fiery flood now boiling in the bottom of the crater. A subduction of lava, by some subterraneous channel, has since taken place, and sunk the abyss many hundred feet, to its present depth.

The gulf below contains probably not less than sixty — fifty-six have been counted — smaller conical craters, many of which are in constant action. The tops and sides of two or three of these are covered with sulphur, of mingled shades of yellow and green. With this exception, the ledge, and everything below it, are of a dismal black. The upper cliffs on the northern and western sides, are perfectly perpendicular, and of a red color, everywhere exhibiting the seared marks of former powerful ignition. Those on the eastern side are less precipitous, and consist of entire banks of sulphur, of a delicate and beautiful yellow. The south end is wholly obscured by smoke, which fills that part of the crater, and spreads widely over the surrounding horizon.

As the darkness of the night gathered round us, new and powerful effect was given to the scene. Fire after fire, which the glare of mid-day had entirely concealed, began to glimmer on the eye, with the first shades of evening; and as the darkness increased, appeared in such rapid succession, as forcibly to remind me of the hasty lighting of the lamps of a city, on the sudden approach of a gloomy night. Two or three of the small craters nearest to us were in full action, every moment casting out stones, ashes, and lava, with heavy detonations, while the irritated flames accompanying them, glared widely over the surrounding obscurity, against the sides of the ledge and upper cliffs, richly illuminating the volumes of smoke at the south end, and occasionally casting a bright reflection on the bosom of a passing cloud. The great seat of action, however, seemed to be at the southern and western end, where an exhibition of ever-varying fireworks was presented, surpassing in beauty and sublimity all that the ingenuity of art ever devised. Rivers of fire were seen rolling in splendid corruscation among the laboring craters, and on one side a whole lake, whose surface constantly flashed and sparkled with the agitation of contending currents.

Expressions of admiration and astonishment burst momentarily from our lips, and though greatly fatigued, it was near midnight before we gave ourselves to sleep, often interrupted during the night, to gaze on the sight with renewed wonder and surprise. As I laid myself down on my mat—fancying that the very ground which was my pillow, shook beneath my head—the silent musings of my mind were: “Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty! greatly art thou to be feared, thou king of saints!”

On Wednesday, the 29th, after an early breakfast, our party, excepting lieutenant Malden, who was ill, Mr. Dampier, who remained to take a sketch, and Mr. Ruggles, who chose to stroll above, prepared for a descent into the crater. One of the few places where this is practicable, was within a rod of the hut in which we lodged. For the first four hundred feet the path was steep, and from the looseness of the stones and rocks on both sides, required caution in every movement. A slight touch was sufficient to detach these, and send them bounding downwards hundreds of feet, to the imminent danger of any one near them. The remaining distance of about the same number of feet, was gradual and safe, the path having turned into the bed of an old channel of lava, which ran off in an inclined plane until it met the ledge before described, more than a quarter of a mile west of the place where we began the descent. By the time we arrived here, the natives, acting as guides with the Messrs. Bloxam and Mr. Powell, had preceded the rest of our number too far to be overtaken, and we became two parties for the rest of the morning; the last, into which I fell, consisted of lord Byron, Mr. Ball, Mr. Davis, Mr. White, with lord Byron's servant and my native boy, to carry a canteen of water, and the specimens we might collect.

Previous to our descent we had provided ourselves with long canes and poles, by which we might test the soundness of any spot before stepping on it, and immediately on reaching the ledge we found the wisdom of the precaution. This offset is formed wholly of scoria and lava, mostly burned to a cinder, and everywhere intersected by deep crevices and chasms, from many of which light vapor and smoke were emitted, and from others a scalding steam. The general surface is a black, glossy incrustation; retaining perfectly the innumerable diversified tortuous configurations of the lava, as it originally cooled, and so brittle as to crack and break under us like ice, while the hollow reverberations of our footsteps beneath, sufficiently assured us of the unsubstantial character of the whole mass. In some places, by thrusting our sticks down with force, large pieces would break through, disclosing deep fissures and holes, apparently without bottom. These however were generally too small to appear dangerous. The width of this ledge is constantly diminished in a greater or less degree, by the falling of large masses from its edges into the crater; and it is not improbable that in some future convulsion, the whole structure may yet be plunged into the abyss below.

Leaving the sulphur banks on the eastern side behind us, we directed our course along the northern part to the western cliffs. As we advanced, these became more and more perpendicular, until they presented nothing but the bare and upright face of an immense wall, from eight to ten hundred feet high, on whose surface huge stones and rocks hung, apparently so loosely as to threaten falling, at the agitation of a breath. In many places a white curling vapor issued from the sides and summit of the precipice; and, in two or three, streams of clay-colored lava, like small waterfalls, extending almost from the top to the bottom, had cooled, evidently at a very recent period. At almost every step, something new attracted our attention, and by stopping sometimes to look up, not without a feeling of apprehension at the enormous masses above our heads, at others to gain, by a cautious approach to the brink of the gulf, a nearer glance at the equally frightful depth below; at one time turning aside to ascertain the heat of a column of steam, and at another to secure some unique or beautiful specimen, we occupied more than two hours in proceeding the same number of miles.

At that distance from our entrance on the ledge, we came to a spot on the western side, where it widened many hundred feet, and terminated next the crater, not as in most other places, perpendicularly, but in an immense heap of broken slabs and blocks of lava, loosely piled together as they had fallen in some convulsion of the mountain, and jutting off to the bottom in a frightful mass of ruin. Here, we had been informed, the descent into the depth of the crater could be most easily made ; but being without a guide, we were entirely at a loss what course to take, until we unexpectedly descried the gentlemen who had preceded us, reascending. They dissuaded us most strenuously from proceeding farther ; but their lively representations of the difficulty and dangers of the way, only strengthened the resolution of lord Byron to go down ; and knowing that the crater had been crossed at this end, we hastened on, notwithstanding the refusal of the guide to return with us. The descent was as perilous as it had been represented ; but by proceeding with great caution, testing well the safety of every step before committing our weight to it, and often stopping to select the course which seemed least hazardous, in the space of about twenty minutes, by a zigzag way, we reached the bottom, without any accident of greater amount than a few scratches on the hands from the sharpness and roughness of the lava, by which we had occasionally been obliged to support ourselves. When about half way down, we were encouraged to persevere in our undertaking, by meeting a native who had descended on the opposite side, and passed over. It was only, however, from the renewed assurance it gave of the practicability of the attempt ; for besides being greatly fatigued, he was much cut and bruised from a fall ; said the bottom was “ino — ino loa — ka wahi O debelo !” — “excessively bad, the place of the devil !” — and could be prevailed on to return with us only by the promise of a large reward.

It is difficult to say whether sensations of admiration or of terror predominated, on reaching the bottom of this tremendous spot. As I looked up at the gigantic wall which on every side rose to the very clouds, I felt oppressed to a most unpleasant degree, by a sense of confinement. Either from the influence of imagination, or from the actual effect of the intense power of a noonday sun beating directly on us, in addition to the heated and sulphureous atmosphere of the volcano itself, I for some moments experienced an agitation of spirits and difficulty of respiration, that made me cast a look of wishful anxiety towards our little hut, which, at an elevation of near fifteen hundred feet, seemed only like a bird's nest on the opposite cliff.

These emotions, however, soon passed off, and we began, with great spirit and activity, the enterprise before us.

I can compare the general aspect of the bottom of the crater, to nothing that will give a livelier image of it to your mind, dear M——, than to the appearance the lake of Otsego would present, if the ice with which it is covered in the winter were suddenly broken up by a heavy storm and as suddenly frozen again, while large slabs and blocks were still toppling, and dashing, and heaping against each other, with the motion of the waves. Just so rough and distorted was the black mass under our feet, only a hundred fold more terrific, independently of the innumerable cracks, fissures, deep chasms and holes, from which sulphureous vapor, steam and smoke were exhaled, with a degree of heat that testified to the near vicinity of fire.

We had not proceeded far, before our path was intersected by a chasm at least thirty feet wide, and of a greater depth than we could ascertain, at the nearest distance we dare approach. The only alternative was to return, or follow its course until it terminated, or became narrow enough to be crossed. We chose the latter, but soon met an equally formidable obstacle in a current of smoke, so highly impregnated with a suffocating gas as not to allow of respiration. What a situation for a group of half a dozen men, totally unaware of the extent of peril to which they might be exposed! The lava on which we stood was in many places so hot that we could not hold for a moment in our hands the pieces we knocked off for specimens. On one side lay a gulf of unfathomable depth, on the other an inaccessible pile of ruins, and immediately in front an oppressive and deadly vapor. While hesitating what to do, we perceived the smoke to be swept occasionally, by an eddy of the air, in a direction opposite to that in which it most of the time settled; and watching an opportunity when our way was thus made clear, we held our breath and ran as rapidly as the dangerous character of the path would permit, until we had gained a place beyond its ordinary course. We here unexpectedly found ourselves also delivered from the other impediment to our progress; for the chasm abruptly ran off in a direction far from that we wished to pursue. Our escape from the vapor, however, was that which we considered the most important; and so great was our impression of the danger to which we had been exposed from it, that when we saw our way to the opposite side open, without any special obstacle before us, we felt disposed formally to return thanks to Almighty God for our deliverance. But before this was proposed, all our number, except lord Byron, Mr. Davis, and myself, had gone forward so far as to be out of call; and, for the time, the external adoration of the Creator, from the midst of one of the most horrible of his works, was reluctantly waived.

At an inconsiderable distance from us was one of the largest of the conical craters, whose laborious action had so greatly impressed our minds during the night; and we hastened to a nearer examination of it: so prodigious an engine I never expect again to behold. On reaching its base, we judged it to be one hundred and fifty feet high, a huge, irregularly shapen, inverted funnel of lava, covered with clefts, orifices, and tunnels, from which bodies of steam escaped with deafening explosion, while pale flames, ashes, stones, and lava, were propelled with equal force and noise from its ragged and yawning mouth. The whole formed so singularly terrific an object, that, in order to secure a hasty sketch of it, I permitted the other gentlemen to go a few yards nearer than I did, while I occupied myself with my pencil. Lord Byron and his servant ascended the cone several feet, but found the heat too great to remain longer than to detach, with their sticks, a piece or two of recent lava, burning hot.

So highly was our admiration excited by the scene, that we forgot the danger to which we might be exposed should any change take place in the currents of destructive gas — which exist in a greater or less degree in every part of the crater — until Mr. Davis, after two or three intimations of the propriety of an immediate departure, warned us in a most decided tone, not only as a friend, but as a professional gentleman, of the peril of our situation: assuring us, that three inspirations of air by which we might be surrounded, would prove fatal to every one of us. We felt the truth of the assertion, and notwithstanding the desire we had of visiting a similar cone, covered with a beautiful in-crustation of sulphur, at the distance from us of a few hundred yards only, we hastily took the speediest course from so dangerous a spot. The ascent to the ledge was not less difficult and frightful than the descent had been, and for the last few yards was almost perpendicular; but we all succeeded in safely gaining its top, not far from the path by which we had in the morning descended the upper cliff.

We reached the hut about two o'clock, nearly exhausted from fatigue, thirst, and hunger; and had immediate reason to congratulate ourselves on a most narrow escape from suffering and extreme danger, if not from death. For, on turning round, we perceived the whole chasm to be filling with thick sulphureous smoke; and within half an hour, it was so completely choaked with it, that not an object below us was visible. Even where we were, in the unconfined region above, the air became so oppressive as to make us think seriously of a precipitate retreat. This continued to be the case for the greater part of the afternoon. A dead calm took place both within and without the crater, and from the diminution of noise, and the various signs of action, the volcano itself seemed to be resting from its labors.

Mr. Ruggles, during his morning ramble, had gathered two large buckets of fine strawberries, which made a delightful dessert at our dinner. The mountains of Hawaii are the only parts of the islands on which this delicious fruit is found. A large red raspberry is also abundant on them; but even when fully ripe, it has a rough acid taste, similar to that of an unripe blackberry. The flavor of the strawberry, however, is as fine as that of the same fruit in America.

Towards evening, the smoke again rolled off to the south, before a fresh breeze; and everything assumed its ordinary aspect. At this time Lieut. Malden, notwithstanding his indisposition, succeeded in getting sufficient data to calculate the height of the upper cliff: he made it nine hundred feet; agreeing with the measurement of Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Chamberlain some months before. If this be correct, it is judged that the height of the ledge cannot be less than six hundred feet; making the whole depth of the crater, that which I have stated in the preceding pages, fifteen hundred feet. On similar grounds, the circumference of the crater at its bottom has been estimated at a distance of from five to seven miles ; and at its top, from eight to ten miles.

Greatly to our regret, we found it would be necessary to set off on our return early the next morning, all the provisions of the natives being entirely expended. We could have passed a week here with undiminished interest, and wished to remain at least one day longer, to visit the sulphur banks, which abound with beautiful crystallizations, and to make some researches on the summit. We would have been glad, also, to have added to the variety of specimens already collected, especially of the volcanic sponge, and capillary volcanic glass, not found on the side of the crater where we encamped. But it was impossible ; and we made preparations for an early departure. Just as these were completed, in the edge of the evening, another party from the Blonde, consisting of about a dozen midshipmen, arrived, with whom we shared our lodgings for the night.

The splendid illuminations of the preceding evening were again lighted up with the closing of the day ; and after enjoying their beauty for two or three hours with renewed delight, we early sought a repose which the fatigue of the morning had rendered most desirable. The chattering of the islanders around our cabins, and the occasional sound of voices in protracted conversation among our own number, had, however, scarcely ceased long enough to admit of sound sleep, when the volcano again began roaring and laboring with redoubled activity. The confusion of noises was prodigiously great. In addition to all we had before heard, there was an angry muttering from the very bowels of the abyss, accompanied, at intervals, by what appeared the desperate effort of some gigantic power struggling for deliverance. These sounds were not fixed or confined to one place, but rolled from one end of the crater to the other ; sometimes seeming to be immediately under us—when a sensible tremor of the ground on which we lay, took place—and then again rushing to the farthest end with incalculable velocity.

The whole air was filled with the tumult; and those most soundly asleep were quickly roused by it to thorough wakefulness. Lord Byron sprang up in his cot, exclaiming, "We shall certainly have an eruption; such power must burst through everything!" He had barely ceased speaking, when a dense column of heavy black smoke was seen rising from the crater, directly in front of us, the subterranean struggle ceased, and immediately after, flames burst from a large cone, near which we had been in the morning, and which then appeared to have been long inactive. Red-hot stones, cinders, and ashes, were also propelled to a great height with immense violence; and shortly after, the molten lava came boiling up, and flowed down the sides of the cone, and over the surrounding scoria, in two beautiful curved streams, glittering with indescribable brilliance.

At the same time a whole lake of fire opened in a more distant part. This could not have been less than two miles in circumference; and its action was more horribly sublime than anything I ever imagined to exist even in the ideal visions of unearthly things. Its surface had all the agitation of an ocean; billow after billow tossed its monstrous bosom in the air, and occasionally those from different directions burst with such violence, as in the concussion to dash the fiery spray, seemingly, forty and fifty feet high. It was at once the most splendidly beautiful and dreadfully fearful of spectacles; and irresistibly turned the thoughts to that lake of fire, from whence, we are told, the smoke of torment shall ascend for ever and ever! No work of him who laid the foundations of the earth, and who by his almighty power still supports them, ever brought to my mind the more awful revelations of his Word with such overwhelming impression. Truly, "with God is terrible majesty!" "Let all the nations say unto God, how terrible art thou in thy works!"

Under the name of Pele, this volcano was one of the most distinguished and most feared of the former gods of Hawaii. Its terrific features are well suited to the character and abode of an unpropitious demon; and few works in nature would be more likely to impose thoughts of terror on the ignorant and superstitious, and, from their destructive ravages, lead to sacrifices of propitiation and peace. It is now rapidly losing its power over the minds of the people; not one of the large number in our company seemed to be at all apprehensive of it as a supernatural being.

After an almost sleepless night, we early turned our faces homeward, not without many "a lingering look behind," even at the very entrance of our path. It was precisely six o'clock when the last of our party left the brink. Never was there a more delightful morning. The atmosphere was perfectly clear, and the air, with the thermometer at 56 deg. Fahrenheit, pure and bracing. A splendid assemblage of strong and beautifully contrasted colors glowed around us. The bed of the crater, still covered with the broad shadow of the eastern banks, was of jetty blackness. The reflection of the early sun added a deeper redness to the western cliffs; those opposite were of a bright yellow, while the body of smoke rising between them hung in a light drapery of pearly whiteness against the deep azure of the southern sky. Mounaloea and Mounakea, in full view in the west, were richly clothed in purple; and the long line of intervening forest, the level over which we were passing, and the precipice by which it is encircled, thickly covered with trees and shrubbery, exhibited an equally bright and lively green.

On gaining the top of the first precipice, the distant view of the crater was so strikingly beautiful, that I stopped long enough to secure a hasty sketch, though most of the gentlemen had preceded me. A copy I hope to send with this account of our excursion. We walked rapidly during the morning, and by twelve o'clock reached the houses built for our accommodation, about half way between the harbor and the volcano. We determined to spend the night here, and after a refreshing nap dressed for dinner, which we took at four o'clock on a bed of leaves spread on the shaded side of one of the houses. We set off before daylight the next morning, and about one o'clock arrived at the bay. H—— was more ill than when I left her: and for the last twelve hours, the family had become so much alarmed, as to think seriously of sending an express for me.

Byron's bay, Monday, July 4, 1825. Lord Byron informed me on Saturday, when dining with him, that the Blonde would leave this harbor, now called Byron's bay in honor of his lordship, on Wednesday of this week, for Kealakekua, on the opposite side of the island. We are seriously apprehensive that H—— will not be able to return in the frigate. She is exceedingly ill, and every hope seems again to be threatened. Mr. Davis called me aside on the Sabbath, and told me he thought nothing but a speedy removal to a more bracing climate could save her, and urged an immediate departure from the islands as soon as she might gain strength to undertake a voyage. Mr. Bloxam, who has been deeply interested in her situation, after a short visit to-day, during which he was particularly affected by her appearance, sent home an album belonging to her, with the following lines, written on returning to his lodgings. I am sorry to say to those who love her, but from whom she is removed too far to receive their sympathy and their special prayers, that they only express the general sentiment, as to her present state.

Sister spirit, come away."

Hark! from realms of rest above
Steals the hymn of peace and love!
As the enfranchised spirit flies
To her home in yonder skies,
Strains which Eden never knew,
Guide her untrod pathway through.

"Sister — ransomed spirit — come!
Exile! seek thy native home!
Come — the Spirit bids thee — here
Never falls the parting tear:
Spread thy wings for speedy flight
To the realms of love and light!"

H. B. M. ship Blonde, Wednesday, 6, 11 o'clock, P. M.
H—— was carried from her bed to the barge, which brought us off at four o'clock this afternoon, and is now quietly reposing in the after-cabin, far from the noise of the ship. When we came on board, we fully expected to proceed to the leeward of the island for eight or ten days;

but, when lord Byron saw how very ill H—— is, partly that she might meet her children as soon as possible, and partly on account of a letter he has received respecting a piratical vessel, he, an hour since, determined to bear away directly for Oahu. This is joyful tidings to us, for we had much reason to fear that H—— could not have survived to see Honolulu by the other route. We are overwhelmed by the kindness and affectionate attention of lord Byron. He has insisted upon relinquishing his own private cabin to us, that we may be free as possible from all the inconvenience of shipboard. Mr. Davis, who manifests deep solicitude for H——, on hearing of the determination to proceed immediately to Oahu, said to her, "In his lordship, madam, you have really met a brother—he is one of the kindest of men!" He has our warm gratitude and lasting affection.

Mission house, at Honolulu, Saturday night, July 9. We passed Diamond Hill this morning at sunrise, and at eight o'clock came to anchor. Soon after breakfast, the barge came alongside to carry us on shore. H—— was removed to the deck, and lowered to the boat in an arm-chair, where a mattress and cot were ready to receive her. On reaching the shore, the crew of the barge carried her in a cot to Mr. Bingham's cottage, where she was safely placed in her own room, less exhausted than we had feared she would be. It was thought advisable that she should take an apartment at the mission house, on account of the greater quietude of the upper rooms, and accordingly this afternoon at four o'clock was removed here. Meeting the children in good health, &c. has produced an excitement of spirits which makes her appear rather revived this evening.

Tuesday, July 12. News from the Spanish main has hastened the departure of the Blonde. Yesterday some of the gentlemen, who did not expect to be on shore again, paid us a farewell visit. Among others, lieutenants Ball and Talbot, and Mr. Wilson the purser, all of whom requested permission to say farewell to H——. This morning I met lord Byron, Mr. Davis, and Mr. Bloxam at breakfast, at Mr. Bingham's, after which they came over to express to Mrs. S——, for the last time, the interest they feel in her situation, and leave their best wishes for her recovery. Immediately afterwards, they went to the point, where the captain's gig was in waiting. Gratitude for their very polite and unwearied attentions, led me to accompany them to the beach, where, with affection and sincere regret, I gave them the parting hand in this world. In the course of an hour, the frigate weighed anchor under a salute from the fort, and early in the afternoon faded from our sight forever.

FOR nearly three months after the departure of the Blonde, I was confined, almost exclusively, to the sick chamber of Mrs. Stewart; and kept brief notes only of passing events. Incidents of a most interesting character, in reference to the success of the mission and the state of the people, were daily taking place — incidents which testified to a change, in the intellectual and moral prospects of the nation, of the most gratifying character.

The number of schools was multiplying as rapidly as books and teachers could be furnished; and already contained fifteen thousand pupils, some thousands of whom were supposed to be capable of reading intelligibly in their own language: while the population of the whole group were calling for the means of instruction. Drunkenness had become a public crime: and the manufacture of intoxicating drinks was prohibited by law. In the region of every missionary establishment, the songs, and dances, and games, and dissipation, once so universal, had ceased. Theft was becoming unpopular and disgraceful; and proclamations against every vice had been made by order of the government through all the islands. The Sabbath was extensively regarded as the day of God, and two-thirds of the whole population in the vicinity of the missionary chapels, regularly attended the preaching of the gospel: forming congregations, at all the principal stations of three thousand, four thousand, and even five thousand hearers. But to furnish in full the proof of these data, would be to extend this volume, already enlarged beyond the promised size, to an undesirable length ; and, I can but briefly add, from a record of a later date, the closing scenes of our residence in the Pacific.

The apprehension excited during the visit of the Blonde, of the necessity of a removal from the islands, for the preservation of Mrs. Stewart's life, was deepened soon afterwards, by the professional opinion of Dr. Blatchely of the mission : and, in the course of a few weeks, became the settled conviction of all who had a knowledge of her situation. As early as the first of September, we considered the certainty of our return to America to rest entirely on the fact of her surviving, in a state to undertake a voyage, until an opportunity of leaving the islands should offer.

That we should meet with a suitable opportunity, at a period sufficiently early, was very improbable. Three requisites were essential, which we could not expect to find united in the same ship in so remote a part of the world — a physician attached to the vessel ; accommodations sufficiently large for a family ; and a ship homeward bound. Indeed, our whole expectation of making a voyage, after the departure of the Blonde, rested on a visit from Com. Hull — commanding the American squadron in the Pacific — in the frigate United States, which letters from the secretary of the navy had led us to anticipate. But Com. Hull might not arrive for months — might not come at all — and if he did, even in time for our purpose, it might not be in his power to accommodate us with a passage.

Such was our attitude, when the ship Fawn, Capt. Dale, of London, touched at Oahu for refreshments in the early part of October. Mr. Short, a surgeon attached to her, soon visited Mrs. Stewart ; and added his opinion to that of others already given, that her rescue depended solely on an early removal from the islands. From him we learned, that the Fawn was bound directly to London ; ascertained that her accommodations were large, and superior to those of most ships navigating the Pacific ; and immediately afterwards had proffered to us by Capt. Dale, in a most kind manner, a passage to England, with every comfort his ship could secure : but only on condition of its being accepted gratuitously, as an expression of his friendship and goodwill. Mr. Short, at the same time, made a similar tender of his professional services to Mrs. Stewart and her family. I could only acknowledge myself deeply affected by the disinterested kindness of those, who until then were entire strangers ; and refer them to the decision of my associates for an answer.

A meeting of the members of the mission then at Oahu was called, and the subject submitted to them in two propositions : 1st, — “ Whether it was my duty, under the existing circumstances of my family, to return, at least for a time, to the United States ? ” and, 2d, — “ If so, whether the kind offer of Capt. Dale, of a gratuitous passage to London, should be accepted ? ” both of which were fully and unanimously decided in the affirmative : and we began to prepare for embarkation at the end of eight days.

After the first emotions of a decision so important, my thoughts and affections were hurried to Maui ; a spot interesting above all others to my heart, and which I could not think of leaving without the farewell visit of at least an hour. This, through the very great kindness of a principal mercantile house at Oahu, I was enabled to do by express, in a small vessel, under the command, for the occasion, of Mr. Elwell, of Boston ; a gentleman connected with the establishment, to whom I had often been indebted for similar marks of friendship. We arrived at Lahaina at midnight, and, as we had been delayed three days, by head winds, on a passage usually made by such vessels in one, and no time was to be lost, in despite of the great darkness of the night and the danger of the surf, I landed immediately.

The mission house had been removed from the place on which it originally stood ; but, familiarity with every spot enabled me easily to grope my way through the luxuriant plantations by which it is now surrounded. But how great was my astonishment at the peculiar circumstances in which I found our inestimable friends, Mr. and Mrs. Richards. Instead of being permitted, unobserved, to break their slumbers by the salutations of friendship and affection, how was I surprised to meet, at my first approach to the house, the presented bayonet, and to hear the stern challenge of the watchful sentry, “ Who goes there ? ” and when assured that it was a friend, how inexplicable to my mind the fact of receiving the cordial embraces of my brother, not in the peaceful cottage of the missionary, but in the midst of a garrison, apparently in momentary expectation of the attack of a foe ; and to find the very couch on which was reclining one who to us has been most emphatically a sister, surrounded by the muskets and the spears of those known to the world only by the name of savages !

My first thoughts were, that a revolt of the island against the general government had taken place, in which our friends had been seized, and were guarded as captives ; or that some formidable party of unfriendly natives had risen with the determination of destroying them, and from whom they were protected by the higher chiefs ; but as soon as an explanation could be given, I learned that their peril was not from the heathen, but from the degenerate sons of a civilized and Christian country ! The seamen of a large British ship at anchor at Lahaina, exasperated at the restraints laid on their licentiousness, through the influence of the mission, had carried their menaces and open acts of violence against Mr. and Mrs. Richards to such an extent as to cause the chiefs to arm their people, and defend them at the hazard of life : and at that very hour, three armed boats' crews, amounting to near forty men, were on shore, with the sworn purpose of firing their houses, and taking their lives before morning !

Only two days before, after a succession of fearful threats and gross insults, the same party, countenanced and upheld by their captain and officers, and armed with knives and pistols, had landed under the black flag of death, and surrounding the missionary enclosure, then unprotected, offered life to our friends only on condition of their retracting their instructions to the islanders founded on the seventh commandment. The firmness with which they were met by Mr. Richards, only made them doubly infuriate ; and, as they seemed ready to fall upon him, to execute threats of horror, Mrs. Richards, with the spirit of a martyr, rushed between them and her husband, exclaiming, " My only protection is in my husband and my God ; I had hoped, that the helplessness of a female, surrounded only by heathen, would have touched the compassion of men from a Christian land — but, if such cannot be the case, know that I stand ready to share the fate of my husband! When I left my country, I took my life in my hand, not knowing when I might be called to lay it down; if this is the time, know that I am prepared — sooner than disgrace the character I sustain, or dishonor the religion of my Master, by countenancing in the people we have come to enlighten a course of conduct at variance with the word of God!" For a moment the heroism of a refined and lovely woman appeared to shake the firmness of their purpose, and they retired from the ground: but it was only to return with a more relentless determination, and the interference of the natives took place in time barely to rescue the lives of their teachers, as is believed, at the hazard of their own. So resolute were they, however, in the defence, when once commenced, that three thousand men were armed, and in readiness to seize the ship, and to make prisoners of her crew, should another outrage of the kind be attempted.

The statement of these circumstances, with the unfolding of the character and object of my visit, made our interview most deeply affecting; and the remainder of the night was spent in thought and conversation, of unmingled sorrow at the termination which was about to take place, of that union and intercourse which for near three years had been the source of some of our highest and sweetest enjoyments.

A first resolution, on the mention of our embarkation in four days, was, to return with me to Oahu, for a last interview with H——; but, after beginning to prepare for the visit, it occurred to them, that, under existing circumstances, it might appear like deserting their post; or, at least, might afford an occasion to their enemies to say, that they had been driven from their station; and with sadness, but with firmness, they determined, from a sense of duty, to forego the melancholy satisfaction they had contemplated.

At sunrise, Mr. Richards and myself visited the spacious, well-built and finished chapel, lately erected by the chiefs: and in the pulpit, from which we had fondly hoped jointly to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation, in tears and in prayer we looked to God, the arbitrator of our destinies, for his blessing on our future divided labors in his cause. And, in the course of an hour, after having bade a hasty adieu to the chiefs and such of the people as were best known to me, we sorrowfully interchanged embraces which we had great reason to fear would prove our last in this world.

I shall never forget the farewell words of Mrs. Richards, especially as connected with the scenes through which she had just passed, and which then might be renewed at any moment—"It is true, I weep, and shall weep again and again. A heavier affliction could scarce befall me, than the removal of your family from the islands, leaving us alone on Maui, in the midst of twenty thousand heathen; but I weep not at my own loss only, I weep also at yours; I have always been contented in my situation, but I never knew the happiness of the missionary life until within the six months past. It seems but yesterday that we went forth weeping with the precious seed of eternal life, and now we are returning from our work daily, bringing our sheaves with us, and shouting the harvest home!"

Never did the field of labor I had hoped to occupy for life, appear so truly desirable: and I found my heart clinging closely to every object included in it, from my associates, and the thousands eagerly desirous of my instruction, to the very trees and shrubbery I had planted and nurtured in our garden. Struggles of strong affection filled me with sadness and gloom, and during the passage to Oahu, I had almost fully determined to permit the Fawn to depart without us, and venture a delay until the United States should arrive. How great then was my surprise and satisfaction to hear before landing, that there had been an arrival from South America, and that a packet from commodore Hull was waiting my return. That gentleman could not know my peculiar situation. Still I was persuaded that his communication would, in the providence of God, make my path plain, and remove every doubt then resting on it. And such was fully the case; for on breaking the seal of a long and kind letter from him, though utterly unaware of the importance of the information to me, he gave the most unqualified assurance that it would be impossible for his vessel to make the proposed voyage to the Sandwich islands. This was all that was necessary to render our duty clear as noonday, and we prepared cheerfully to follow the path we believed pointed out of God.

Still, warm affection for our companions, some of whom, besides Mr. and Mrs. Richards — especially Mrs. Bingham — were in circumstances of affliction greatly to aggravate the sorrow of a separation; love to their work, and to our work, and the highly encouraging state of the people, thousands of them delighting in our instructions, and tens of thousands perishing from a want of more laborers in a field ripe for the sickle, all caused us to bid farewell to the Sandwich islands with feelings of the most painful depression. Rude as was the throng which covered the beach as our boats shoved off, unlike as was the whole scene, except in the murmur of sympathy and the salutations and tears of affection, to the enlightened and pious multitude, and the beautiful and classic ground on which our eyes rested, as we waved a last adieu to the American shores — it was scarce less affecting, and caused an agitation of heart far more oppressive, than any we experienced, ON THE NINETEENTH OF NOVEMBER, 1822.

APPENDIX.

It has been thought that the following Letters would form a welcome and not inappropriate Appendix to the preceding record. Though hastily written, for the columns of a daily newspaper, to meet and arrest, at an early period, any unfavorable impressions which might be made on the public mind by the misrepresentations and detractions of a leading literary journal in Europe, respecting the missionaries at the Sandwich islands, they furnish, it is believed, a just, though brief and imperfect, exposition of the origin and general character, as well as falsity, of the calumnies which for years have been widely and industriously circulated, both in Europe and America, on the authority of prejudiced and misinformed — and perhaps in some cases unprincipled — voyagers and redacteurs of travels.

LETTERS ADDRESSED TO J. EVARTS, ESQ., COR. SEC. OF THE A. B. C.
FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, IN REPLY TO AN ARTICLE IN THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW, FOR MARCH, 1827.

LETTER I.

Boston, July 9, 1827.

DEAR SIR: Early after the arrival, in this country, of the March number of the London Quarterly Review, my attention was directed to an article it contains, relating to the Sandwich islands. A Review of a "Voyage of his majesty's ship Blonde, in the years 1824, 1825," is made an occasion of presenting to the public the characters, instructions, and influence of the American missionaries residing at the Sandwich islands, in a most erroneous and unjust light, and of conveying impressions of the design and result of their establishment there, as unfavorable as they are unfounded.

The legitimate ends of a literary review are, by able and candid criticism, to improve the public taste ; by the presentation of correct sentiments, to guide the public judgment ; and by a facility of circulation, widely to disseminate knowledge derived from authentic sources. If these are the principles by which the editors of the London Quarterly are governed, they cannot but desire the correction of any false statements, and the removal of any false impressions, made through their instrumentality : if they are not, when chargeable with such statements and such impressions, they deserve to be publicly exposed.

I do not hesitate to assert, sir, in the firm confidence of furnishing the proof, that the Review, so far as it relates to the American missionaries, is chargeable with gross error, misrepresentation, and falsehood.

Error in point of fact, is stamped on the very first pages of the article. For some object—and no other is discoverable than that of wresting from the American missionaries the merit of having introduced the religion of the cross at the Sandwich islands—the writer, supported as it appears by Mrs. Graham, (a lady employed by the publisher of the voyage to prepare the work for the press from the notes of the Rev. Mr. Bloxam, chaplain of the frigate) says, p. 424, that Christianity “was planted, at the Sandwich islands, by the spontaneous will of the natives, before any mission even of persuasion had reached them.”

This declaration immediately follows an account of the destruction of idolatry by the young king Liholiho ; and is predicated on the baptism of two of his most distinguished chiefs. The whole sentence reads thus : “From this moment, (the overthrow of the idols and the burning of the temples) two chiefs possessed of great power and influence, Kalaimoku (better known by the assumed name of William Pitt) and Boki his brother, resolved to take the first opportunity of solemnly and openly professing Christianity ; and accordingly, when Capt. Freycinet touched at the Sandwich islands in his voyage round the world, these two chiefs were baptized by the chaplain of his ship ; and thus, to use the words of Mrs. Graham, Christianity “was planted by the spontaneous will of the natives, before any mission even of persuasion reached them. It was not until the following year that the American missionaries landed on the islands.”

Now, sir, let us for one moment examine this statement. The French corvette Uranie, under the command of M. Freycinet, arrived at the island of Hawaii, (Owhyhee) on her voyage round the world, on the eighth of August, 1819 ; she sailed again on the sixteenth of the same month, and after a visit of a few days at the islands of Maui and Oahu, took her final departure from the group, and pursued her homeward course by Cape Horn. The destruction of idolatry and the abolition of the kabu system did not occur until late in the month of November following. How can these two facts, with their dates established by incontestible record, be made to agree with the statement in the Review ?

the sentence would have read thus: "From the moment of the abolition of idolatry in November, 1819, two chiefs, Kalaimoku and Boki, resolved to take the first opportunity solemnly and openly to profess Christianity; and were accordingly baptized on the fifteenth day of the preceding August, when Capt. Freycinet touched at the Sandwich islands!" Here, if in no other place, the author must plead guilty to a charge either of error willful and deliberate, or of ignorance inexcusable in one of such high pretensions and positive spirit.

The truth of the circumstance to which the reviewer has reference, is simply this: The Roman Catholic chaplain attached to M. Freycinet's vessel, was in the practice of baptizing natives at many of the islands visited by that navigator, from a belief that even uninstructed heathens, though utterly ignorant of the nature and design of the ceremony, would, by it, be rescued from endless perdition. It has been boasted of him, by persons holding the same religious creed, that he thus saved the souls of many thousands and islanders during the voyage. On his arrival at the Sandwich islands, the same motive led him to baptize many there. Kalaimoku, though still in all the darkness and degradation of open idolatry, was of the number. A minute account of this baptism is given in the voyage; but no mention is made of any request, on the part of Kalaimoku, for the administration of the rite; nor is it intimated that he appeared in the least impressed with the importance and solemnity of the ordinance. On the contrary, it is expressly stated that no one of the chiefs present manifested much interest in the transaction. And M. Arago, in his "Letters on M. Freycinet's Voyage," after exhibiting the whole ceremony to his readers as a religious farce, adds a comment on the performance, sufficiently indicative of its character, in the following words—"After exchanging presents with M. Freycinet, the minister Pitt took his leave; and, furnished with his passport to Paradise, went home to his seven wives, and to sacrifice to his idols!"

Christianity would have been introduced as "solemnly" and as directly, by the "spontaneous will of the natives," had the zealous priest, in place of Kalaimoku, baptized the idols which still continued to be the objects of his worship, and thus converted the images themselves from logs of wood to saints of the calendar.

The exposure of this error, however, is unimportant, except as a proof of the misrepresentation in which the whole article abounds. My next letter will embrace a topic more intimately connected with the reputation of the missionaries.

Yours, &c.

C. S. STEWART.

LETTER II.

Boston, July 10, 1827.

In the same paragraph of the article in the London Quarterly, to which I directed your attention yesterday, the spirit of vituperation, at last so unsparingly bestowed on the American missionaries at the Sandwich islands, is exhibited in a sneer, connected with the name of the principal island of the group.

This name has been generally written and pronounced Owhyhee, a sound differing essentially from the name of the island as spoken by the natives themselves. On gaining a knowledge of the language, the missionaries were fully persuaded of this fact; and when it became necessary to fix the orthography of the word, it was determined, rather than to force upon the islanders an arbitrary foreign usage, to adhere to the simple sounds composing it as pronounced by themselves, and to write and speak the name in a manner intelligible at once to the whole population and conformable to the genius of their tongue. The change in the spelling thus induced, has led the reviewer to assert, in connexion with a most convincing proof, in parenthesis, of his prerogative to decide the merits of the case, that this word, (Owhyhee) "by a silly affectation of Italianizing, as they call it, the language and proper names, (the letter w in Italian!) the American missionaries are pleased to spell Hawaii."

The contempt lurking in this sentence fails of its object. No missionary at the Sandwich islands ever gave the reason here assigned for altering the orthography of any word in the language of the country; such a reason never crossed the brain of any of their number, and silly indeed is the credulity of the writer in believing so improbable a fabrication to be true.

One important and salutary consequence of establishing a Christian mission at the Sandwich islands, has been the introduction of letters; and a first effort of the missionaries was the reduction of the language to a written form. As soon as practicable, an alphabet containing the requisite number of letters, was chosen from the Roman characters; and, instead of the English sounds of the vowels, those given to them in the principal languages of the continent of Europe, were adopted. It was made a radical principle of this alphabet, that each letter should have but one invariable sound; in the oral language it was ascertained that every syllable ended with a vowel. And following these three simple rules, the missionaries, in writing the name under discussion as spoken by the natives, necessarily and rightly spelled it Hawaii—a word of three syllables, accented on the second: Ha pronounced as in hazard, wai as wi in wild, an i as ee in bee.

The o, which had previously been attached to the name, was satisfactorily discovered to be only the sign of a case, and not a part of the proper noun. The islanders were heard to say, No Hawaii, I Hawaii, Mai Hawaii, as well as O Hawaii: making the regular declension of the noun Hawaii,

Nom.	O Hawaii,	Hawaii.
Poss.	No Hawaii,	Of Hawaii.
Obj.	I and Mai,	To and from Hawaii.

The missionaries had but slender helps in forming their alphabet. The labors of professor Lee, of Cambridge, England, were not known to them; and Mr. Pickering's alphabet for Indian languages was not published. It is a sufficient proof of their intelligence and judgment in this matter, that the Hawaiian alphabet is formed precisely on the same principles as the alphabet of the New Zealand language, proposed by professor Lee, one of the most distinguished philologists in Europe. The vowel sounds are the same, also, as those in Mr. Pickering's alphabet, which he formed for writing the Indian languages of the American continent, and which, as I am informed, is strongly approved by Mr. Duponceau, of Philadelphia. These three alphabets—namely, professor Lee's, Mr. Pickering's, and that of the American missionaries—were formed independently of each other; and yet they agree substantially, if not perfectly; all their vowel and diphthongal sounds, at least, are the same.

Does it appear, then, sir, to have been a "silly affectation," or to have been good sense, that led the missionaries, in presenting a written language to the people of those islands, to give them their own names of persons and places, in forms analogous to the orthography of their whole tongue, rather than attempt to introduce anomalies, arising from the mistakes and carelessness of foreign visitors, and which would have been intelligible to them only as terms by which the inhabitants of other countries designated their persons and islands?

It would have been more kind in the reviewer, as a gentleman, before thus casting his contempt on the mission, to have informed himself from the volume before him, "Ellis's Tour through Hawaii," of the true cause of the change he ridicules; and more ingenuous in him, as a scholar and critic, to have mingled with his animadversion, had he still thought it merited, one word of commendation on the assiduity and facility with which an unformed and savage tongue has been clothed, and so placed before its possessors, that thousands, in the course of three or four years, are capable of reading and writing it, and tens of thousands are, by it, daily making advances in the elements of knowledge.

In this connexion, I would advert for a moment to a charge in another part of the article: that the preachers at the islands, "from the nature of their education," are unfit to instruct the natives in the doctrines and duties of religion; and are frequently not a little puzzled by the remarks and questions of their simple hearers. As I have no longer the happiness of being one of the number of those preachers, I may, without an offence to delicacy or propriety protest against this assertion. The missionaries make no claim to the character of learned and scientific men: it will not be contended that they are accomplished scholars and erudite philosophers; but all who know them, will not hesitate to deny the allegation of the reviewer. The ministers of the gospel who first landed at the Sandwich islands, and those with whom I was more especially associated in leaving this country three years afterwards, were all men of liberal education. For nine years at least, before their embarkation from America, they had been pursuing a regular course of classical, collegiate and theological study, at the first literary institutions of our country. They bore with them, to their distant destination, the respect of their tutors and professors, for good native talent, and for attainments in literature and science, equal to those of their fellow-students; and as a body, they are as well fitted for the stations they occupy, as the clergy of England and America are for their duties at home.

Yours, &c.

C. S. STEWART.

LETTER III.

Boston, July 12, 1827.

The writer of the article on the Sandwich islands introduces a notice of the great volcano of Hawaii, by representing the superstitious dread of that phenomenon among the people as altogether invincible. "On the votaries of this particular superstition," he says, "the missionaries were unable to make the least impression." "It was in vain they set up Jehovah, as they were wont to do, in opposition to Pele, the goddess of subterranean fire." "The king, with all the assistance of his chiefs and all the endeavors of the missionaries, strove in vain to put down her worship: nothing was ever able to expell the belief that, when offended, she visited the children of men with thunder, lightning, earthquakes, and streams of liquid fire — the instruments of her mighty power and vengeance."

This representation, sir, is far from being correct. The superstitious fear and worship of Pele, the presiding deity of volcanos, gave way, as readily as any other, to the instructions of Christianity. Her highest power, and most deeply-rooted influence, were confined, in a great degree, to the inhabitants of the districts of Hawaii, peculiarly exposed to exhibitions of volcanic action; especially to the regions in the immediate vicinity of the great crater of Kilauea. This section of country is more remote from the earliest missionary establishment than any other in the whole cluster of islands; and not until three years after the arrival of the first missionaries, did a single ray of Christian light ever penetrate the darkness of its dwellings. It is no matter of surprise then, that, with the marks of former desolating eruptions on every feature of their land — with volumes of smoke rising from the hideous gulf by day, and fires glaring against the clouds of heaven by night, ever in their view — the natives here should still have remained subject to the terrors of ignorance and idolatry, and have offered constant sacrifices of propitiation to the power thought by them to control so truly fearful an object.

In the summer of 1823, a party of missionaries, in making the tour of Hawaii, visited this volcano. They were the first who ever approached it with boldness, in total disregard of all the rites of Pele, and in defiance of the threats of her priests and people. They ate, without hesitation, of the forbidden fruit growing on her immediate territories; slept on the brink of her dwelling, and descended into the depths of her imaginary abode. The impunity with which these supposed aggressions were made, gave weight in the minds of the islanders who witnessed them, to the assertions of the missionaries, that no supernatural being resided there, and that the whole was only a sublime exhibition of the power of Jehovah, the Creator of the heavens and of the earth, and the only living and true God. And the acknowledgment — "Great indeed is the God of the foreigners; weak is Pele!" — fell from the lips of many. In the course of the succeeding year, other members of the mission visited the crater again and again; measured its circumference above and below, calculated its depth, passed over its terrific bottom, and, without injury or accident, explored every accessible part; and thus renewedly demonstrated to the natives the folly of their groundless superstition.

Early in the year 1825, Kapiolani, one of the most distinguished of the female chiefs, determined to visit a missionary station, then but recently established, at Waiakea — now Byron's bay — on the eastern coast of Hawaii. Her route across the island led her to the crater of Kilauea. As she approached this object, she entirely neglected all the observances enjoined by the priestess and votaries of the goddess, and openly reproved them for their idolatry. In vain they denounced against her the anger of their deity. Kapiolani replied, she had no fear of Pele — that the fires of the volcano were the work of Jehovah, and he only was her God. She soon thus put the idolatrous party to silence and shame; and ventured, not only to the edge of the tremendous chasm, but, accompanied by a missionary, descended several hundred feet into the abyss, and in evidence of the truth of her declaration, composedly worshipped God, from the midst of one of the most terrible of his works.

This scene, the author of the review sketches with a glowing pencil; and to it he directs the attention of his readers with great enthusiasm. Kapiolani is presented, in bold relief, as the daring philanthropist, the enlightened philosopher, the devout and heroic Christian, by one courageous act freeing her people forever from a cruel bondage of fear.

The character of this chief is indeed worthy of admiration; and the firmness and intrepidity exhibited at the volcano in her contest with the worshippers of Pele, merit high encomium. They did much towards the overthrow of the remaining power of the false goddess, and greatly strengthened the faith of those who had previously burst the chains of that superstition. A principal object, however, in adverting to this incident, is, to notice the very strange use to which the whole is applied by the reviewer. Instead of pointing to Kapiolani as one instance, at least, of the highest success of the missionary enterprise, in the dignity, intelligence and piety manifested by her, he makes the introduction of her character merely an occasion of casting fresh contempt on the missionaries: points to her as being more wise than her teachers; and, by "a simple, practical explanation of the power of steam, as having done more to weaken the belief of the votaries of Pele, than could have been done by five hundred sermons!" Immediately following which, we have the broad but unsupported assertion, that "the missionaries in this quarter have not, indeed, displayed much common sense in their methods of proceeding."

When the American missionaries arrived at the Sandwich islands, in the year 1820, Kapiolani was as ignorant, dark-minded and superstitious as any of her fellows. She was intemperate, and dissipated in all her habits; and in her whole character, as widely as possible, different from the portrait of her given in the Review. By what means, I would ask, was the transformation accomplished? By what process was she freed from the ignorance and superstition of all her preceding life? How was she rescued from drunkenness and debauchery and every vice? How did she become an enlightened philosopher and a devout and resolute Christian? — Only by the daily instruction and unwearied labors of the missionaries. She was among the very first of the nation, to give attention to the elements of learning — among the very first to render credence to our religious faith and to put in practice its moral precepts — and among the very first to exhibit in her life the sobriety, purity, and dignity of a Christian. Long before her visit to Kilauea, she had learned from the missionaries, that the volcano was a natural phenomenon, whose action was readily accounted for on known principles of philosophy; and in approaching its fires and descending into its bosom, she had their repeated example to induce and encourage her to the enterprise.

LETTER IV.

Boston, July 14, 1827.

The commander of the ship whose voyage forms the subject of the Review, was the Rt. Hon. Lord Byron. The appearance of this nobleman at the Sandwich islands, made a most happy impression on the minds of the chiefs, and was followed by results highly propitious to the interest of the nation, and to the operations of the American missionaries.

The dignity and rectitude of his whole character — a rectitude in such wide contrast with the deportment of too many of those who visit that distant part of the world; the wisdom and prudence of his counsels to the government; and the kindness of all his intercourse with the chiefs and people, fully secured to him the respect and confidence of every class. And at the end of some ten weeks, he took his departure, amid the gratitude and prayers both of the chiefs and their teachers.

At the time the Blonde reached the islands, Mrs. Stewart was exceedingly ill. Mr. Davis, the surgeon of the frigate, to whom we were indebted for a voluntary daily attendance, strongly recommended the trial of a voyage for the benefit of her health. In consequence of this advice, accommodations were assigned to us, through the kindness of lord Byron, on board the Blonde, in a trip she made to the island of Hawaii. When at sea, both in going and returning, I had a seat at his lordship's table, and free access at all times to his society. During the whole month of our absence from Oahu, so full an opportunity was given me of forming a correct opinion of his character, and so perfect was the confidence I had just reason to place in the candor and sincerity of his heart, that I cannot believe, without stronger, very much stronger evidence than any yet presented, that he ever gave the least authority for the misrepresentation and detraction of the Review.

That he has given such authority, the writer, though cautious in his language, is evidently desirous of impressing on the minds of his readers. With what good ground I utterly discredit the intimation, I will leave you, sir, to judge from some two or three of many reasons.

The article under examination contains the following paragraph: "There was one point on which lord Byron appears justly to have felt some uneasiness, and this was the tone, manner and line of conduct of the American missionaries, particularly one of the name of Bingham. The influence which this man had acquired over the simple natives, and his uncalled for interference in petty concerns, wholly unconnected with the mission, were but too manifest on many occasions—but never more openly, nor more offensively, than when Boki, one Saturday evening, expressed a wish to entertain his countrymen with an exhibition of phantasmagoria. The young king and his sister, with many of the chiefs and people, had assembled to see the show, when, behold! a message was received from this Bingham, "that on so near an approach of the Sabbath, prayer was a fitter employment!"—and such was the ascendancy which this man had gained, that the two poor children were carried off in tears, and many of the chiefs and people followed to the missionary meeting. Mr. Stewart, another of the missionaries, ashamed of the indecency of such conduct, was anxious to explain the matter, by saying that they followed the Jewish mode of reckoning time, and considered Sunday to begin on Saturday at noon."

This, sir, is a most uncandid and illiberal misrepresentation—or rather a representation so distorted and discolored, as to be in its leading points absolutely false. The simple circumstances of the incident here referred to are the following:—An exhibition of the magic lantern had been promised to the chiefs by Mr. Bloxam, the chaplain, as an amusement with which they would be greatly delighted. No evening, however, was at the time appointed for the entertainment. On a Saturday morning, some ten days after the arrival of the Blonde, lord Byron incidentally mentioned to me, that Kaahumanu (a female chief—one of the regents of the island during the minority of the king,) had just taken breakfast with him:—had inquired when the show was to take place, and that at her request the evening of that day had been fixed on for the purpose. I offered no objection to the time specified, and expressed a belief that the natives would be highly gratified with the exhibition.

I was afterwards informed, (though not by lord Byron) that the time was thus communicated to afford an opportunity to the missionaries, if they thought proper, to be present on the occasion. I did not, however, understand the remark in this manner, and the thought of making the arrangement known to my companions did not occur to my mind. To the best of my knowledge they were all utterly ignorant of the intended show.

Just in the edge of the evening, our attention was attracted by the sudden entrance of several natives to one of the mission houses, with the half terrified exclamation, "Great is the displeasure of the British chief!" — and we saw a party of the highest chiefs, among others the regent, Kalaimoku, hurrying in much agitation through our enclosure. As soon as the confusion which took place admitted of an understanding, we ascertained the circumstances to be these: — The chiefs and their immediate associates had, at the advice of some native teachers educated in America, without the approbation, attendance, or even knowledge of the missionaries, recently established a prayer meeting on Saturday night. This meeting had been altogether forgotten by Kaahumanu in making the appointment of the evening — from some cause, she did not on her return to her residence, inform the other chiefs of the entertainment promised by lord Byron, and they appeared to have been ignorant of it until the very moment when they were assembling for their customary worship. As soon as she mentioned it, a consultation had taken place, and they despatched a messenger to lord Byron, with the request that he would defer his visit to them with the phatasmagoria, until Monday night. Notwithstanding the message, he had arrived, was greatly displeased, and they in alarm had come to the missionaries for advice.

A statement of the circumstances in reference to lord Byron, was afterwards given to me by Mr. Bloxam himself. It appeared, that as the messenger was leaving the establishment of the chiefs, he saw the party from the Blonde approaching: not being able to speak English, he closed the gate through which they were about to pass, and exclaimed, "kabu! kabu!" — a term of prohibition. Lord Byron caught the word, and knowing its general meaning, in a tone of surprise and displeasure, demanded of a native interpreter with him, who spoke English but imperfectly, what the messenger said. The unusual tone and manner of the question threw the man into such agitation, as to make him incapable of an intelligible reply. He could only repeat the words, "chiefs," and "missionaries," and "prayers," and "Sabbath," and "kabu," so incoherently, that lord Byron received an impression, that the chiefs had forbidden his entrance to the enclosure by the advice of the missionaries, because it was the night before the Sabbath, and they were at prayers. It is by no means surprising, that, with this persuasion, he entered the yard with an appearance of displeasure — especially when it is recollected that the engagement for the evening had been made at the request of a leading chief, and with the knowledge and approbation of a member of the mission. As soon as his dissatisfaction was known, many of the chiefs fled to the mission house in the manner stated.

Mr. Bingham expressly told them there was no impropriety in the exhibition : that lord Byron had proposed it only for their gratification and amusement ; and by his advice some of the number, among others Kalaimoku and the young king, returned to witness it. Some, however, would not, but went to their usual prayer meeting. No missionary attended this meeting, and none were engaged in any service with the natives that evening. No message of any kind was sent by Mr. Bingham to the place of exhibition, or to any of the chiefs. The young king and his sister, instead of being carried off in tears, ran themselves from the place in terror ; and no persuasion could induce the princess to leave her hiding place and return.

At the close of the evening, Mr. Bingham, knowing that the entertainment had been confused and interrupted, addressed a letter to lord Byron on the subject. This led him to say to Mr. Bingham on meeting him the next day, "Why did not Mr. Stewart tell me on Saturday morning, that there was a religious meeting in the evening ? I would not then on any consideration have made the appointment. I am the very last man" — an assertion I fully believe — "ever knowingly to interfere with the religious services of the people." On learning this mention of my name, I immediately wrote a note to his lordship, stating the true and only reason of my silence — my entire ignorance of any such meeting — and added an explanation of the circumstances as I understood and knew them to be. But that explanation was never marked with the ignorance and absurdity stamped on it in the Review. The case did not require any exhibition of my knowledge in Jewish antiquities ; and if it had, I could have secured sufficient information on the point from some one of our native pupils, if from no other source, to have saved me from the exposure of ignorance attributed to me by the reviewer.

My letter received a prompt and kind answer — still in my possession — in which lord Byron declares himself perfectly satisfied of the mistake in which the confusion of the evening originated : speaks of the event as a thing too trivial ever to merit another thought : and gives an assurance, that it has not left the slightest impression on his mind unfavorable to the mission. No interruption to the pleasant and friendly intercourse which had commenced between himself and the missionaries took place : and three weeks afterwards, at a public council of the chiefs, called for the purpose of formally establishing the right of the young king to the throne, and at which lord Byron presented the schedule of civil and political principles mentioned in the Review, he openly and fully avowed his approbation of our object and proceedings, and

The very last time this nobleman was on shore, previous to his final departure from Oahu, two months after the affair of the phantasmagoria, he led me aside for a moment's private conversation : at the close of which he requested my candid opinion of the general impression made by his visit. I expressed the firm belief, that no officer in the British navy could have given more entire satisfaction, or have secured more of the confidence and affection of both chiefs and people : and added, that I would assume the responsibility of saying, in the name of the missionaries, that in departing from the islands he carried with him their high respect, gratitude and blessing. He replied that he rejoiced in this assurance ; and on his part, was truly happy to say to me that on his return to England, he should feel it a duty and privilege to meet the inquiries of government and of the Christian public, concerning the American missionaries, with the declaration that they were entirely worthy of their confidence and favor, and were the best friends and benefactors of the nation.

And this, sir, was the report he made on reaching Great Britain. Though we parted on the shores of Oahu, not expecting ever to see each other again in this world, we landed in England within a fortnight of the same time, and met in London a few weeks afterwards ; but not until lord Byron had given a satisfactory proof of the sincerity of his assurance to me on parting at the islands, by a public speech, before a highly respectable and numerous audience — the late Mr. Butterworth, M. P. in the chair — in which he mentioned the American missionaries with commendation, and gave a highly favorable account of their success.

Such are some of the reasons which lead me wholly to disbelieve that his lordship has been accessory to the detraction of the reviewer.

Yours, &c.

C. S. STEWART.

LETTER V.

Boston, July 18, 1827.

The last charge I pledged myself to substantiate, against the reviewer, is that of falsehood.

"By Mr. Ellis's own account," he says, "the subjects usually chosen for the discourses of the missionaries are the most unsuitable to be addressed to an uneducated multitude that can possibly be imagined — such, for instance, as the Virgin Mary and the immaculate conception — the Trinity and the Holy Ghost." These are points on which, as thus stated, not a single sermon was ever preached at the Sandwich islands by any one of the missionaries ; and it is with the most barefaced effrontery, that the writer refers to Mr. Ellis's book, in support of the calumny. As a specimen of all the subjects of discourse mentioned by Mr. Ellis, I will transcribe without selection, or known omission, the texts found in the first hundred pages of his tour. Speaking of the observance of the first Sabbath on Hawaii, he remarks—"Mr. Bishop preached from John iii. 16, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life'"—and endeavored in the most familiar manner to set before the people the great love of God in sending his Son to die for sinners, and the necessity of forsaking sin, and believing on him, in order to eternal life. The succeeding passages within the limit mentioned above, are—"This is the day the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it."—"Blessed are the eyes which see the things which ye see."—"Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."—"We preach unto you, that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein."—"Good and upright is the Lord; therefore will he teach sinners in the way."—"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."—&c. &c.

It is then alleged that "according to their (the missionaries) rule, the more time that is spent in preaching, praying, and singing, the better. The least that is required from the half-naked converts of Owhyee, &c. is to attend at church five times every day; and on Sundays they are strictly prohibited from cooking any kind of victuals, or even making a fire. Boki was refractory on this point,—protested strongly against a kabu of this rigid nature, and insisted on having his tea on Sunday mornings, as he was accustomed in London."

This statement is almost too ridiculously untrue to be worthy of refutation. The religious services held by the missionaries at the churches with the natives, instead of being five every day—are only three in each week—two of these are on the Sabbath, and the third on the afternoon of Wednesday. At the time I left the islands in 1825, there was a catechetical exercise every Monday, at which, however, some fifty or a hundred only of the people attended—also a prayer meeting on Friday, held by a few natives themselves, and at which the missionaries were seldom present.

The manner of cooking among the natives is totally different from ours—they are universally in the habit of preparing at one time a quantity of food sufficient for several days, and the process of doing this, like the baking of bread with us, requires the labor of nearly a whole day. Not to have discouraged this on the Sabbath, would have been to allow it to remain unnecessarily a day of work. We therefore advised both chiefs and people to have their poe, a principal article of diet, beaten and mixed before the Sabbath; but this advice was unaccompanied by any prohibition whatever, much less by that of kindling a fire. As to the making of tea and such refreshments on the Sabbath, Boki could hardly have found occasion for the remark attributed to him. It would not have been necessary for him to have pleaded his indulgences in London to secure his cup of tea — he need only have pointed to the same hot beverage on the breakfast and tea tables of the missionaries every Sabbath, and asked why we partook so openly of a luxury which by rigid kabu we denied to him and his people?

All our instructions in reference to the Sabbath were founded on the general principle of avoiding unnecessary work, and abstaining from unsuitable recreations; and in no instance did they extend to the introduction of burdensome observances, or to the injunction of any self-denial involving an unprofitable austerity.

We are next presented, by the reviewer, with a series of allegations, supported by the name and letters of Capt. Beechey, commander of H. M. sloop of war the Blossom. This officer visited the Sandwich islands in May, 1826, on his way to Behring's Straits, and as the reviewer says, writes to England in the following manner: "The efforts of the few zealous missionaries are tending, as fast as possible, to lay waste the whole country, and plunge the inhabitants into civil war and bloodshed. Thousands of acres of land, that before produced the finest crops, are now sandy plains. Provisions are so extremely scarce, that not long since the king sent to beg a little bread of the American consul: the fishery is almost deserted, and nothing flourishes but the missionary school."

Capt. Beechey's visit at the Sandwich islands was limited to a period of about ten days; and it is not probable that his report of the condition and prospects of the nation was the result of extensive personal observation. He has the reputation of being an intelligent and scientific man; but in this single instance, at least, he must have permitted his better judgment to have been imposed on by the misrepresentation of others, and must have yielded the sense of seeing entirely to that of hearing, in forming his opinion of the state of the islanders. He could not have been on shore an hour at the port of Honolulu, where he came to anchor, without having the fullest proof that the king at least was in no danger of starvation.

But to the charges of his letter in their order. He states that the country is becoming a desolation from the influence of the missionaries — that thousands of acres of land which before (their efforts) produced the finest crops, are now sandy plains.

In the year 1804, sixteen years before the arrival of the missionaries at the Sandwich islands, Mr. Shaler, a gentleman of respectability and information, at present American consul at Algiers, was at that group in the Pacific. A copy of his journal was politely put into my hands by Dr. Mease, of Philadelphia, shortly after I saw this account of Capt. Beechey. Mr. Shaler notices the same desolate plains as bearing marks of former high cultivation, which caused the commander of the Blossom so much alarm; but he attributes their appearance to a much more rational cause — the despotism of Kamehameha. He remarks, "it is well understood that no chief of the least consequence can reside anywhere but near the person of the monarch; and as he migrates through his dominions, he draws after him a train more destructive than locusts. Every thing is abandoned to follow the sovereign; and the country, deserted by all who have an interest in its cultivation, and in the improvement of the lands, becomes of course neglected. I have observed many fine tracts of land lying thus neglected, even in the fertile plains of Lahaina: the ruined enclosures and broken dykes around them were certain indications that they were not always in that state."

I well recollect on landing at Oahu, in 1823, to have had the uncultivated plain, to which Capt. Beechey probably alludes, pointed out to me by one of the older of the foreign residents, as an evidence of the rapid deterioration of the country since the accession of the young king Liholiho. While Kamehameha lived, he said, that extensive tract was covered with potatoes and melons, sugarcane and bananas; but since his death everything was going to ruin. The mission at that time had scarce become firmly established. Little change had then been effected in the habits and pursuits of the people; and it was too early to bring a calumny against them through this channel. But now, when thousands of the natives have become interested in learning to read and write, and have been prevailed on to devote the hours of every day, which they once spent in games and dances, to their schools, it is very easy and very convenient for the opposers of our instructions to say to a visiter, from whom the engagedness of the islanders in the objects of the mission cannot be concealed, "It is true the schools and churches flourish, but look at the desolation of that plain — it is all in consequence of the influence of the missionaries — the whole country is going to ruin in the same manner!"

The true cause of the appearances in many parts of the country of a more extensive cultivation and improvement of land formerly than is seen at present, is two-fold. They arise first, and principally, from the rapid depopulation of the islands, from destructive wars and the crime of infanticide, which prevailed to a very great extent, and from the drunkenness and disease introduced by foreigners; and secondly, from a custom among the natives of frequently changing the location of their cultivated grounds — forming a new plantation where there had not been one, and leaving that which they had previously occupied to go to waste. This they frequently do from various inducements, such as that of securing greater advantage of water in irrigation, &c. &c.

As to the scarcity of provisions mentioned by Capt. Beechey, and the extremity to which the young king in consequence of it was driven for a crust of bread, I have some striking illustrations in a few statistical data, put into my possession by a gentleman just arrived in this country from a six years' residence at the islands, and who was at Oahu at the time of Capt. Beechey's visit.

Ships in considerable numbers, first began to frequent the Sandwich islands for refreshments in the years 1822 and 1823. In 1822 the number touching at Honolulu was 33; and in 1823 it amounted, at the same place, to 57. The mission at that time, had exerted no influence over the people in general; there were then but few religious services to call them from their work, and no school to interfere with the cultivation of their lands — but provisions were scarce, the prices were high, and the ships were not readily supplied with the refreshments they required. In the year 1826, that of Capt. Beechey's visit, the number of vessels that called at Oahu, was 107 — some remained a week, some a fortnight, others a month, and others again three months. They were all abundantly supplied with provisions, such as hogs, goats, fowls, eggs, potatoes, kalo, cabbage, onions, pumpkins, cucumbers, bananas, melons, &c. &c. while they remained in port; and each, on an average, carried to sea from 40 to 60 barrels of potatoes, and other vegetables, besides live stock. The market was always full, and the demand so profusely supplied, that potatoes and kalo, instead of being $3 per barrel as was the case in preceding years, sold in the public market for $2 and $1.50, and could be procured at private sale for $1. The rate of all other articles was proportionably lower than formerly.

The story about the young king and American consul, is too absurd for a moment's remark. Every person in the least acquainted with the despotic power of the government, knows that the whole nation would die with famine before the king's tribute would fail; and proof is not wanting that there never was a time, in the reign of the present monarch, when he could not in a day have collected provisions for a thousand men.

Yours, &c. C. S. STEWART.

LETTER VI.

Boston, July 18, 1827.

I think it unnecessary, sir, to pursue a refutation of the remarks on the Sandwich islands, extracted from the letters of Capt. Beechey, to a more tedious length. They are all equally open to exposure: the apprehension of civil war and bloodshed, which he expresses, was as groundless as his fears of a famine. And the gratuitous charge founded on it, by the reviewer, "that the American teachers apply and expound the text of scripture which says, that in the kingdom of heaven none is before or after another, — none greater nor less than another, so as exactly to tell the poor creatures, that 'all men are equal;' and thus to have produced a visible insubordination to the chiefs," is as ridiculous as his apocryphal text of scripture is untrue.

With these extracts from Capt. Beechey's letters, the animadversion of the writer ceases; and shortly after, the article is brought to a close by a speculation on the origin of the islanders. The author's decided opinion is, that it is oriental. In Pele, the goddess of volcanos, he clearly recognises the Pel, Bel, or Baal, of the eastern world: and in all the customs, habits, games, &c. of the people, traces the Asiatic character. As a finishing proof of the correctness of his opinion, he adds the following sentence : " Their dispersion over the Pacific is easily accounted for, by the constant easterly winds, which at various times and in various directions, may have blown fishing canoes from the Asiatic islands to those scattered over the Pacific, and from one of these islands to another — which last accident, indeed, is constantly happening at the present day."

Unfortunately for this theory, the argument here adduced, instead of being the strongest in its favor, is the most conclusive of all others against its truth. The constant easterly winds of the Pacific, between the parallels of latitude including most of the clusters of islands, instead of facilitating the dispersion of an Asiatic race over the face of that ocean, would present the most formidable of existing impediments to such migration. The canoes of the South Sea islanders are peculiarly unfit for sailing against the wind ; and with these rude boats only for navigation, it seems impossible that the inhabitants of the Marquesas, Society, and Sandwich islands, should have struggled against a regular eastern wind to their present abodes.

Had the argument been adduced to prove the islanders to be of Mexican or Peruvian origin, it would have been good ; but as it stands, it is only an additional evidence of the error of the article from the beginning to the end.

It was doubtless thought by the author a most happy circumstance, that just as the Review was about to appear, a letter should arrive from the islands confirming the allegations against the American missionaries. This letter is introduced in a note, at the close of the number, and is so important a document, that I will place before you the whole of it, as published by the editors, together with their introductory paragraph.

" Since the preceding pages have been struck off, we have been favored with the following literal copy of a letter of Boki, (which we pledge ourselves to be genuine,) confirming what we have stated with regard to the conduct of the American missionaries at the Sandwich islands."

" Islands of Woahoo, Jan. 24, 1826.

" Sir, — I take this opportunity to send you thes fu lines, hoping the will find you in good health, as bles god the leve me at present. I am sorrey to inform You that Mr. Pitt (Karamakoo) has gon thro four opperashons since you sailed from here, but thank god he is now much better, and we ar in hops of his recovery, and I am verey sorey to tell you that Mr. Bingham the head of the Misheneres is trieng every thing in his pour to have the Law of this country in his own hands. all of us ar verrey happy to have sum pepel to instruct us in what is rite and good but he wants us to be entirely under his laws which will not do with the natives. I have done all in my pour to prevent it and I have done it as yet. Ther is Cahomano wishes the Misheneres to have the whol atority but I sholl prevent it as long as I cane, for if the have their will be nothing done in thes Islands not even cultivation, for their own use. I wish the peppel to reid and to rite and likewise to worke, but the Misheneres have got them night and day old and young so that ther is verrey little don her at present. The pepel in general ar verrey much discetisfied at the Misheneres thinking they will have the laws in their own hands. Captain Charlton has not arrived from Otiety which makes me think sumthing has happened to him. Mr. Bingham has gone so far as to tell thes natives that neither king George nor Lord Byron has any regard for God, or any of the English cheefs, that they are all bad pepel but themselves, and there is no redemson for any of the heads of the English or American nations God send you good health and a long life.

‘Mrs. Boki sends her kind love to Lord Biron and Mr. Camrone and the Hon. Mr. Hill.

(Signed)

NA-BOKI.’”

I have called this letter an important document; and I believe that you, sir, upon examining it, in connexion with one or two facts in my possession, will be of the same opinion. The editor pledges himself that it is genuine—if it is meant by that term, that the original letter is the composition and writing of Boki, I do not hesitate, on my part, to pledge myself that it is not genuine; and being thus at issue, I will present the evidence on which I stake the case.

The first proof I would offer, is in the spelling of the proper names:—Woahoo, Karaimakoo, Cahomano, and Otiety. All these words are in constant and familiar use; they are words of the native language, which Boki has had occasion to spell a thousand times since he has learned to write; and yet, not one of them is here spelled correctly; nor are the mistakes committed, in any instance, those into which a native would fall. Every letter in their language has one sound only, and every letter is sounded. Consequently their errors in spelling are all in the omission, and not in the substitution of letters. These words, however, are spelled according to the orthography in use among foreigners. Boki would have written them thus—Oahu, Kalaimoku, Kaahumanu, and Tahiti.

In the second place, the general spelling is such as no native, writing in English, would have adopted. The peculiarity of the native orthography is not betrayed in a single instance—which, in the midst of so much bad spelling, is truly singular. One great difficulty in such a case would have been, in stringing consonants together without the intervention of a vowel: in his own language every consonant is invariably followed by a vowel: but in this letter, in many instances, vowels are omitted where they ought to have been introduced, and a row of consonants put together, which no native could pronounce—for instance, in the word “sumthing.”

The third proof I would present, is the general style and idiom of the letter. In these respects it is exactly such a letter as an illiterate Englishman or American would write, and commences with a sentence which forms the beginning of almost every vulgar letter in the English tongue. Had the letter been of Boki's own composition, this would not have been the fact. A national idiom would have been manifested at least occasionally. But from the beginning to the end, there is not a thought, nor phrase, indicative of the Sandwich-islander. That you may judge of the force of this argument, I will give a translation of a letter to Mr. Bingham, written by Kalaimoku, brother of Boki, and regent of the islands, on hearing of the opposition of foreigners to the missionaries, and their accusations against them.

"LOVE TO YOU, MR. BINGHAM :

This is my opinion concerning all you missionary teachers of us. I know of no faults in you. If I knew of any I would mention them to you. No, ye are upright. When you gave us the pala-pala, (instruction in reading and writing) we learned : when you gave us the word of God, we obeyed. Our females are sacred. We have learned the word of God ; but, foreigners come here and commit wickedness in our land — men from America and from Britain. Be not troubled ; it is on our account you are blamed ; it is not yourselves. Here is my mind with the word of Jehovah — I have given my heart unto God, together with my body and my soul. I have become one of the church of Jesus Christ. Examine ye — Mr. Bingham and company — my sentiments, that ye may know, and, if ye desire it, transmit my communication to the United States, to our chief — the President. It is with yourselves to do it. Affection to our chief in America — love to him.

Honolulu, Oahu, October 28, 1826."

But it is not necessary, sir, to have recourse to the internal evidences of the production to prove that Boki never wrote it. The point is at once settled by the fact, that Boki could not at the time the letter is dated, either speak, write or understand English, nor can he at the present time. In all his intercourse with English and American visitors, he is obliged to resort to an interpreter ; and even so recently as last December, was incapable of detecting the misinterpretation of a single sentence in English, spoken before him, in an interview with Capt. Jones, of the U. S. ship Peacock, and wrongly interpreted by design. The letter cannot be genuine, for without a miracle, equal to the gift of tongues, he could not have written it.

If he did not write it — it is a forgery. If it is not the production of a native, and it is impossible that it ever could have been, then it is the attempt of a foreigner, ignorant of the genius and idiom of the language of the islanders, to write as he might suppose a native, imperfectly acquainted with the English language, would write. The manifest and only disguise of the whole piece is bad spelling : no man capable of writing at all, or who was ever taught to spell, could have fallen into the orthography exhibited. If it is an attempt at bad spelling, it is an attempt to deceive; and, if an attempt to deceive, it is a base forgery.*

It is possible, however, that Boki may have been induced to sign a letter which he could neither read nor understand; and the original signature may be his own. There is every reason to believe that Boki was entirely friendly to the mission at the time when the letter purports to have been written. We know, however, that ten months afterwards, through the unceasing and determined misrepresentations and perversion of foreigners, who, from the situations they hold at the islands, would naturally have influence with the chiefs, he did openly and directly, to the missionaries themselves, express a dissatisfaction with their preaching, because they in their public instructions discountenanced gambling and drunkenness; he having been persuaded to believe these vices honorable in men of rank. There are circumstances which make it highly probable that the letter, pretended to be written by him, was fabricated at this period, but ante-dated for reasons connected with the greater probable success of the imposition. At all events, the letter did not leave the islands until about that period, for, as I have been told, it was sent by a vessel which then sailed for Valparaiso, and was there put on board the Cambridge 74, to be carried to England.

The manifestation of Boki's displeasure referred to, was followed in the course of a few weeks by a public written acknowledgment to the missionaries, of the rectitude of all their proceedings; and by an expression of regret for the part he had in that instance taken. Should he eventually prove unfriendly to the mission, it will only be through the persevering efforts of foreigners opposed to the moral influence of Christianity in the nation of which he is a chieftain.

In these strictures, dear sir, you have my estimate of the justice and truth of the article in question in the London Quarterly Review.
Yours, &c.

C. S. STEWART.

ADDENDA.

During a visit to Philadelphia some months since, I presented to professor Green, of that city, a few specimens in conchology, which I had brought with me from the Sandwich islands for that purpose. After an examination of them, he was kind enough to transmit to me, for insertion in this volume, a description of two.

*See lord Byron's opinion of this letter in his note to Mr. Ellis, in the Introduction.

A point of delicacy, arising from the friendship with which he honors me, is involved in the publication, as will be perceived from the article. But I do not feel at liberty to withhold from the lovers of science the result of his examination; and trust I shall be excused for acknowledging, in this manner, the unmerited politeness of the distinguished naturalist.

Description of two new species of ACHATINA, from the Sandwich Islands. By J. GREEN, A. M. Prof. of Chem in Jeff. Med. College.

A testa sinistrorsa — ovato — oblonga — lutescente, minutissime striata — colore varia, nunc unicolore, nunc divertissime fuscata — columella rosea — labro tenui — intus albido.

STEWART'S ACHATINA. Shell heterostophe — conical — oblong; about one inch in length and half an inch in diameter — whorls six or seven, rounded and marked with numerous oblique and delicate striæ — apex rather obtuse, and not eroded — a deeply impressed line along the upper part of the whorls, parallel with the suture, periostracha smooth and very glossy, color and markings exceedingly various, the ground color is usually greenish or some shade of yellow, sometimes a single blackish colored band accompanies the suture, sometimes this band is double and of different shades, and on many specimens there are two bands, one at the suture and one in the middle of the whorls. In some varieties the base of the body whorl is dark brown, the rest of the shell being of a dark fawn, and not unfrequently the whole shell is without any markings whatever; in which case the color is yellow, the aperture, when inverted, is ear-shaped, the truncation of the columella is rounded and thickened in a remarkable manner at its edge; along the inner margin of the outer lip there is a strong callous ridge, as in most of the species of this genus, which gradually attenuates towards the edge of the lip which is thin and sharp inside, white and pinkish round the columella.

This splendid little ACHATINA was brought from Oahu, one of the Sandwich islands, by the Rev. C. S. Stewart. He informs me that it is found in considerable numbers in the deep valleys of Oahu, at all seasons, adhering to the under surface of the large leaves of a plant called Ti, — dracæna terminalis — and from the roots of which they brewed an intoxicating liquor, which was in general use before the arrival of the missionaries. Though the leaves of the ti are the favorite resort of this ACHATINA, it is by no means confined to that plant. The islanders sometimes eat the animal which inhabits this shell, as they frequently do fish, without cooking; but a favorite mode of preparing it, is to tie up, in the large leaves of the ti, considerable numbers of them at once, bake them thus with heated stones, and then pick out the animal with a small pointed instrument. The beautiful and shining colors of this ACHATINA, and the manner of their arrangement, forcibly remind us of the HELIX nemoralis, or hortensis, so common in the woods and hedges throughout France and England.
